118 M d Inville (see his Maps and l Euphrate et le Tigre p 92 93) traces their march and assigns the true position of Hatra Ur and Thibphata which Ammianus has mentioned He does not complain of the Samiel the deadly hot wind which Thevenot (Voyages part ii l 1 p 192) so much dreaded.

119 The retreat of Jovian is described by Ammianus (xxv 9) Libanius (Orat Parent c 143 p 365) and Zosimus (l. iii [c 33] p 194)

120 Libanius (Orat Parent c 145 p 366) Such were the natural hopes and wishes of a rhetorician.

121 The people of Carrhae a city devoted to Paganism, buried the insidious messenger under a pile of stones (Zosimus l. iii [c 34] p 196) Libanius, when he received the fatal intelligence cast his eye on the sword but he recollected that

Plato had condemned suicide and that he must live to compose the Panegyric of Julian (Libanius de Vita sua tom ii p 45 46 [rd. Morel. Paris. 1627])

122 Ammianus and Eutropius may be admitted as fair and credible witnesses of the public language and opinions The people of Antioch reviled an ignominious peace which exposed them to the Persians on a naked and defenceless frontier (Excerpt Valesiana || 845 ex Johanne Antiocheno)

123 The Abbé de la Bléterie (Hist de Jovien tom 1 p 212–227) though a severe casuist has pronounced that Jovian was not bound to execute his promise since he could not dismember the empire nor alienate without their consent the allegiance of his people I have never found much of light or instruction in such political metaphysics.

124 At Nisibis he performed a royal act. A brave officer his namesake who had been thought worthy of the purple was dragged from supper thrown into a well and stoned to death without any form of trial or evidence of guilt Ammian. xxv 8.

127 Zosimus l. iii [c 32] p 192 193 Sextus Rufus de Provinciis c 29 Augustine The City of God l. iv c 29 This general position must be applied and interpreted with some caution

128 Ammianus xxv 10 Zosimus l. iii [c 34] p 196 He might be edax et vino Venerique indulgens But I agree with La Bléterie (tom. l p 148–154) in rejecting the foolish report of a Bacchanalian riot (ap Suidam) celebrated at Antioch by the emperor his wife and a troop of concubines.

129 The Abbé de la Bléterie (tom l p 196 209) handsomely exposes the brutal bigotry of Baronius who would have thrown Julian to the dogs ne cepit quidem sepulture dignus 130 Compare the sophist and the saint (Libanius Monod tom ii p 251 and Orat Parent.

145 p 367 c 156 p 377 with Gregory Nazianzen Orat iv || 125–132) The Christian orator faintly mutters some exhortations to modesty and forgiveness but he is well satisfied that the real sufferings of Julian will far exceed the fabulous torments of Ixion or Tantalus.

131 Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom. iv p 549) has collected these visions Some saint or angel has observed to be absent in the night on a secret expedition etc

132 Sozomen (l. vi. 2) applauds the Greek desertion of Byzantium but the whole passage which a Jesuit might have translated is prudently suppressed by the president Cousin

133 Immediately after the death of Julian an uncertain rumour was scattered relo cecidisse Romanos It was carried by some deserters to the Persian camp and the Romans were reproached as the assassins of the emperor by Sapor and his subjects (Ammian xxv 6, Libanius de ulciscendâ Juliani nece, § xiii p 162, 163) It was urged, as a decisive proof, that no Persian had appeared to claim the promised reward (Liban Orat Parent c 141, p 363) But the flying horseman who darted the fatal javelin might be ignorant of its effect, or he might be slain in the same action Ammianus neither feels nor inspires a suspicion

134 Οστις εντολην πληρων τῷ σφῶν αὐτῶν ἀρχοντι This dark and ambiguous expression may point to Athanasius, the first without a rival of the Christian clergy (Libanius de ulcis Jul nece, c 5, p 149 La Bléterie, Hist de Jovien, tom 1 p 179)

135 The orator (Fabricius, Biblioth Græc tom vii p 145-179) scatters suspicions, demands an inquiry, and insinuates that proofs might still be obtained He ascribes the success of the Huns to the criminal neglect of revenging Julian's death

136 At the funeral of Vespasian, the comedian who personated that frugal emperor anxiously inquired how much it cost?—Fourscore thousand pounds (centes)—Give me the tenth part of the sum, and throw my body into the Tiber Sueton

in Vespasian, § 19, with the notes of Casaubon and Gronovius

137 Gregory (Orat iv p 119, 120 [ed Paris, 1609, Orat v c 16, 18, p 157, seqq ed Bened 1778]) compares this supposed ignominy and ridicule to the funeral honours of Constantius, whose body was chaunted over Mount Taurus by a choir of angels

138 Quintus Curtius, l iii § 4 The luxuriancy of his descriptions has been often censured Yet it was almost the duty of the historian to describe a river whose waters had nearly proved fatal to Alexander

139 Libanius, Orat Parent c 156, p 377 Yet he acknowledges with gratitude the liberality of the two royal brothers in decorating the tomb of Julian (de ulcis Jul nece, § 7, p 152)

140 Cujus suprema et cineres, § qui tunc justè consuleret, non Cydnus videre deberet, quamvis gratissimus amnis et liquidus sed ad perpetuandam gloriam rectè factorum præterlabere Tiberis, intersecans urbem æternam, divorumque veterum monumenta præstringens Ammian xxv 10

Chapter XXV

1 The medals of Jovian adorn him with victories, laurel crowns, and prostrate captives DuRoi, Famil Byzantin p 52 Flattery is a foolish sledge, she destroys herself with her own hands

2 Jovian restored to the church τὸν ἀρχαῖον κλῆσμον, a forcible and comprehensive expression (Philostorgius, l viii c 5, with Godefroy's Dissertations, p 329 Sozomen, l vi c 3) The new law which condemned the rape or marriage of nuns (Cod Theod l ix tit xxv leg 2) is exaggerated by Sozomen, who supposes that an amorous glance, the adultery of the heart, was punished with death by the evangelic legislator

3 Compare Socrates, l iii c 25, and Philostorgius, l viii c 6, with Godefroy's Dissertations, p 330

4 The word celestial faintly expresses the impious and extravagant flattery of the emperor to the archbishop τῆς πρὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ τῶν ὁλῶν δημιουργεῖσας (See the original epistle in Athanasius, tom ii p 33) Gregory Nazianzen (Orat xxi p 392) celebrates the friendship of Jovian and Athanasius. The primate's journey was advised by the Egyptian monks (Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom viii p 221)

5 Athanasius, at the court of Antioch, is agreeably represented by La Bléterie (Hist de Jovien, tom 1 p 121-148) he translates the singular and original conferences of the emperor, the primate of Egypt, and the Arrian deputies The Abbé is not satisfied with the coarse pleasantry of Jovian, but his partiality for Athanasius assumes, in his eyes, the character of justice

6 The true era of his death is perplexed with some difficulties (Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom viii p 719-723) But the date (AD 373, May 2) which seems the most consistent with history and reason is ratified by his authentic Life (Maffei, Osservazioni Letterarie, tom iii p 81)

7 See the observations of Valesius and Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol iv p 38) on the original letter of Athanasius, which is preserved by Theodoret (l iv c 3) In some MSS this indiscreet promise is omitted, perhaps by the Catholics, jealous of the prophetic fame of their leader

8 Athanasius (apud Theodoret, l iv c 3) magnifies the number of the orthodox, who composed the whole world, πᾶσι δόλιγῶν τῶν τὰ Ἀγέλου ὁροῦντων This assertion was verified in the space of thirty or forty years

9 Socrates, l iii c 24. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat iv p 131) and Libanius (Orat Parentalis, c 148, p 369) express the living sentiments of their respective factions

10 Themistius, Orat v p 63-71, edit Harduin, Paris, 1684 The Abbé de la Bléterie judiciously remarks (Hist de Jovien, tom 1 p 199) that Sozomen has forgot the general toleration, and Themistius the establishment of the Catholic religion Each of them turned away from the object which he disliked, and wished to suppress the part of the edict the least honourable, in his opinion to the emperor Jovian

11 Οἱ δὲ Ἀρριανῶντες οὐχ ἵππῳ δίκαιον πρὸς αὐτὸν ἔλλα ἱεροσολύμων αὐτοῦ ὡδαῖς καὶ τρυφαιαῖς καὶ τοῖς εὐλαβομένοις φαρμακοῖς (facti ut libellum) Jovian Antiochen in Excerpt Valsuan p 845 The libell

Antioch may be admitted on very slight evidence

12 Compare Ammianus (xxv 10) who omits the name of the Batavians with Zosimus (I iii [c 35] p 197) who removes the scene of action from Rheims to Sirinium

13 Quos capita scholarum ordo castrensis appellat Ammianus xxv 10 and Vales ad locum.

14 Cujus vagitus pertinaciter reluctantis ne in curulis illi videretur ex more id quod mox accidit portendebat [Amm I c] Augustus and his successors respectfully solicited a dispensation of age for the sons or nephews whom they raised to the consulship. But the curule chair of the first Brutus had never been dishonoured by an infant

15 The Itinerary of Antoninus fixes Dadastana 125 Roman miles from Nice 117 from Ancyra (Wesseling Itinerar p 142) The pilgrim of Bordeaux by omitting some stages reduces the whole space from 242 to 181 miles Wesseling p 574

16 See Ammianus (xxv 10) Eutropius (x 18 [9]) who might likewise be present Jerom (tom 1 p 26 [tom 1 p 341 ed Vallars] ad Heliodorum) Orosius (vii 31) Sozomen (I vi c 6) Zosimus (I iii [c 35] p 197 198) and Zonaras (tom II i xiii [c 14] p 28 29) We cannot expect a perfect agreement and we shall not discuss minute differences

17 Ammianus unmindful of his usual candour and good sense compares the death of the harmless Jovian to that of the second Africanus who had excited the fears and resentment of the popular faction

18 Chrysostom tom 1 p 336-349 edit Mont faucon The Christian orator attempts to comfort a widow by the examples of illustrious misfortunes and observes that of nine emperors (including the Caesar Gallus) who had reigned in his time only two (Constantine and Constantius) died a natural death. Such vague consolations have never wiped away a single tear

19 Ten days appear scarcely sufficient for the march and election. But it may be observed—1 That the generals might command the expeditious use of the public posts for themselves their attendants and messengers 2 That the troops for the ease of the cities marched in many divisions and that the head of the column might arrive at Nice when the rear halted at Ancyra.

20 Ammianus xxvi 1 Zosimus I iii [c 36] p 198 Philostorgius I viii c 8 and Godefroy Dissertation p 334. Philostorgius who appears to have obtained some curious and authentic intelligence ascribes the choice of Valentinian to the prefect Sallust the master-general Arintheus Dagalauphus count of the domestics and the patrician Datianus whose pressing recommendations from Ancyra had a weighty influence in the election

21 Ammianus (xxx 7 9) and the younger Victor [Epit c 45] have furnished the portrait of Valentinian which naturally precedes and illustrates the history of his reign

22 At Antioch where he was obliged to attend the emperor to the temple he struck a priest who had presumed to purify him with lustral water (Sozomen I vi p 6 Theodoret I iii p 16) Such public defiance might become Valentinian but it could leave no room for the unworthy delation of the philosopher Maximus which supposes some more private offence (Zosimus I iv [c 2] p 200 201)

23 Socrates I iv A previous exile to Melitene or Thebais (the first might be possible) is interposed by Sozomen (I vi p 6) and Philostorgius (I vii p 7 with Godefroy's Dissertation p 293)

24 Ammianus in a long because unreasonable digression (xxvi 1 and Valesius ad locum) rashly supposes that he understands an astronomical question of which his readers are ignorant. It is treated with more judgment and propriety by Orosius (de Die Natali c 20) and Macrobius (Saturnal I i c 12-16) The appellation of Bimile which marks the inauspicious year (Augustus ad Januarium Epist 119) is derived from the repetition of the sixth days of the calendar of March.

25 Valentinian's first speech is full in Ammianus (xxvi 2) concise and sententious in Philostorgius (I viii c 8)

26 Si tuos amas Imperator optime habes fratrem in Rempublicam quare quem vestias Ammianus xxvi 4 In the division of the empire Valentinian retained that sincere counsellor for himself (c 6)

27 In suburbano Ammianus xxvi 4 The famous Hebdomon or field of Mars was distant from Constantinople either seven stadia or seven miles. See Valesius and his brother ad loc and Ducange Const I ii p 140 141 172 173

28 Participem quidem legitimum potestatis sed in modum apparitoris morderum, in progrediens aperiet textus Ammianus xxvi 4

29 Notwithstanding the evidence of Zonaras Suidas and the Paschal Chronicle M de Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom. v p 671) wishes to disbelieve these stories as advantageous to his payen

30 Eunapius celebrates and exaggerates the sufferings of Maximus (p 82 83 [p 102 ed Comin]) yet he allows that this sophist or magician the guilty favourite of Julian and the personal enemy of Valentinian was dismissed on the payment of a small fine

31 The loose assertions of a general discourse (Zosimus I iv [c 2] p 201) are detected and refuted by Gillemeont (tom v p 21)

32 Ammianus xxvi 5

33 Ammianus says in general terms subagitis ingenis nec bellis nec liberalibus studiis eruditus Ammianus xxxi 14 The orator Themistius with the genuine impertinence of a Greek wished for the first time to speak the Latin language the dialect of his sovereign τῆ δ ἀλεκτορ σπῆ κενεῖ Orat vi p 71

34 The uncertain degree of alliance or consanguinity is expressed by the words ἀδελφὸς cognatus comobrinus (see Valesius ad Ammianus xxi.)

3) The mother of Procopius might be a sister of Basilina and Count Julian, the mother and uncle of the Apostate Ducange, Fam Byzantin p 49

35 Ammian xxiii 3, xxvi 6 He mentions the report with much hesitation sursumvixit obscurior fama, nemo enim dicti auctor existit verus It serves, however, to mark that Procopius was a Pagan Yet his religion does not appear to have promoted, or obstructed, his pretensions

36 One of his retreats was a country-house of Eunomius, the heretic The master was absent, innocent, ignorant, yet he narrowly escaped a sentence of death, and was banished into the remote parts of Mauritania (Philostorg i ix c 5, 8, and Godefroy's Dissert p 369-378)

37 Hormisdas maturo juveni Hormisdas regalis illius filio, potestatem Proconsulis detulit et civilia, more veterum, et bella, recturo Ammian xxvi 8 The Persian prince escaped with honour and safety, and was afterwards (A D 380) restored to the same extraordinary office of proconsul of Bithynia (Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 204) I am ignorant whether the race of Sassan was propagated I find (A D 514) a pope Hormisdas, but he was a native of Iruino, in Italy (Pagi Brev Pontific tom i p 247)

38 The infant rebel was afterwards the wife of the emperor Gratian, but she died young and childless See Ducange, Fam Byzantin p 48, 59

39 Sequimini culminis summi prosapiam, was the language of Procopius, who affected to despise the obscure birth and fortuitous election of the upstart Pannonian Ammian xxvi 7

40 Et designatus hominem superare certamine despicabilem, auctoritatis et celsi fiducia corporis, ipsis hostibus jussit, suum vincere rectorem atque ita turmarum antesignanus umbratilis comprehensus suorum manibus The strength and beauty of Arminius, the new Hercules, are celebrated by St Basil, who supposes that God had created him as an immutable model of the human species The painters and sculptors could not express his figure the historians appeared fabulous when they related his exploits (Ammian xxvi [c 8] and Vales ad loc)

41 The same field of battle is placed by Ammianus in Lycia, and by Zosimus at Thyatira, which are at the distance of 150 miles from each other But Thyatira alluitor Lyca (Plin Hist Natur v 31, Cellarius, Geograph Antiq tom ii p 79) and the transcribers might easily convert an obscure river into a well known province

42 The adventures, usurpation, and fall of Procopius, are related, in a regular series, by Ammianus (xxvi 6, 7, 8, 9, 10) and Zosimus (i iv [c 4] p 203-210) They often illustrate, and seldom contradict, each other Themistius (Orat vii p 91, 92) adds some base panegyric and Eunapius (p 83 84 [p 104, ed Comm]) some malicious satire

43 Libanius de ulciscend Julian nece, c ix [v] p 158, 159. The sophist deplores the public frenzy, but he does not (after their deaths) impeach the justice of the emperors

44. The French and English lawyers of the present age allow the theory, and deny the practice, of witchcraft (Denisart, Recueil de Decisions de Jurisprudence, au mot Sorciars, tom iv p 553 Blackstone's Commentaries, vol iv p 60) As private reason always prevents, or outstrips, public wisdom, the president Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws, i viii c 5, 6) rejects the existence of magic.

45 See Œuvres de Bayle, tom iii p 567-589 The sceptic of Rotterdam exhibits, according to his custom, a strange medley of loose knowledge and lively wit

46 The Pagans distinguished between good and bad magic, the Theurgic and the Goetic (Hist de l'Academie, etc, tom vii p 25) But they could not have defended this obscure distinction against the acute logic of Bayle In the Jewish and Christian system, all demons are infernal spirits, and all commerce with them is idolatry, apostasy, etc, which deserves death and damnation

47 The Candia of Horace (Carm i v Od 5 [Epod 5], with Dacier's and Sanadon's illustrations) is a vulgar variety The Erichtho of Lucan (Pharsal vi 430-827) is tedious, disgusting, but sometimes sublime She chides the delay of the Furies, and threatens, with tremendous obscurity, to pronounce their real names, to reveal the true infernal countenance of Hecate, to invoke the secret powers that lie below hell, etc

48 Genus hominum potentibus insidum, sperantibus fallax, quod in civitate nostra et vetabitur semper et retinebitur Tacit Hist i 22 See Augustine, The City of God, i viii c 19 and the Theodosian Code, i ix tit vii with Godefroy's Commentary

49 The persecution of Antioch was occasioned by a criminal consultation The twenty-four letters of the alphabet were arranged round a magic tripod and a dancing ring, which had been placed in the centre, pointed to the four first letters in the name of the future emperor, Θ ε ο Δ Theodorus (perhaps with many others who owned the fatal syllables) was executed Theodosius succeeded Lardner (Heathen Testimonie, vol iv p 353-372) has copiously and fairly examined this dark transaction of the reign of Valens

52 The cruel persecution of Rome and Antioch is described and most probably exaggerated, by Ammianus (xxviii 1, xxix 1, 2) and Zosimus (i iv [c 13] p 216-218) The philosopher with some justice was involved in the charge of magic (Funapius in Vit Sophist p 88 89 [p 110 ed Comm]) and young Chrysostom who had accidentally found one of the proscribed books gave himself for lost (Tillemont Hist des Empe reurs tom v p 340)

53 Consult the six last books of Ammianus and more particularly the portraits of the two royal brothers (xxx ii § xxi 14) Tillemont has collected (tom v p 12-18 p 127-133) from all antiquity their virtues and vices

54 The younger Victor asserts that he was valde timidus (Epit c 46) yet he behaved as almost every man would do with decent resolution at the head of an army The same historian attempts to prove that his anger was harmless Ammianus observes with more candour and judgment incidentia crimina ad contemptam vel laxam principis amplitudinem trahens in sanguinem saeviebat [xxv 14]

55 Cum esset in acerbitate naturae calore propensor poenas per ignes augebat et gladios Ammian xxv 8 See xxvii 7

56 I have transferred the reproach of avarice from Valens to his servants Avarice more properly belongs to ministers than to kings in whom that passion is commonly extinguished by absolute possession

57 He sometimes expressed a sentence of death with a tone of pleasantry Abi Comes et muta ei caput qui sibi mutari provinciam cupit A boy who had slipped too hastily a Spartan bound an armourer who had made a polished cuirass that wanted some grains of the legitimate weight etc were the victims of his fury

58 The innocents of Milan were an agent and three apparitors whom Valentinian condemned for signifying a legal summons Ammianus (xxvii 7) strangely supposes that all who had been unjustly executed were worshipped as martyrs by the Christians His impartial silence does not allow us to believe that the great chamberlain Rhodanus was burnt alive for an act of oppression (Chron Paschal § 302 [tom i p 558 ed Bonn])

61 These salutary institutions are explained in the Theodosian Code I xlii tit lii De p'sessoribus et fidei et l xiv t. ix De Stud iis liberalibus Urbis Romae Besides our usual guide (Godefroy) we may consult Ciannone (Historia di Napoli tom I p 105-111) who has treated the interesting subject with the zeal and curiosity of a man of letters who studies his domestic history

62 Cod Theodos I i tit xi. with Godefroy's Paratitlon which diligently gleans from the rest of the code

63 Three lines of Ammianus (xxvi 14) countenance a whole oration of Themistius (viii p 101 120) full of adulation pedantry, and commonplace morality The eloquent M. Thomas (tom i p 366-396) has amused himself with celebrating the virtues and genius of Themistius who was not unworthy of the age in which he lived

64 Zosimus I iv [c 3] p 202 Ammian xxx 9 His reformation of costly abuses might entitle him to the praise of in provinciales admodum parvus, tributorum ubique molliens sarcinas By some his frugality was styled avarice (Jerom Chron p 188 [tom viii p 809 ed Vallart])

65 Testes sunt leges a me in exordio Imperii mei datae quibus unicuique quod animo imbutus colendi libera facultas tributa est Cod Theodos I ix tit xvi leg 9 To this declaration of Valentinian we may add the various testimonies of Ammianus (xxx 9) Zosimus (I iv [c 3] p 204) and Sozomen (L vi § 7 21) Baronius would naturally blame such rational toleration (Annal. Eccles ad 370 No 129-132 ad 376 No 3 4)

66 Eudorus was of a mild and timid disposition When he baptised Valens (A D 367) he must have been extremely old since he had studied theology fifty five years before under Ircian a learned and pious martyr Philostorg I ii c 14-16 L iv c 4 with Godefroy p 82 206 and Tillemont Mém Ecclési tom v p 474-480 etc

67 Gregory Nazianzen (Orat xxv p 432) insults the persecuting spirit of the Arians as an infallible symptom of error and heresy

68 This sketch of the ecclesiastical government of Valens is drawn from Socrates (I iv) Sozomen (I vi) Theodoret (I iv) and the immense compilations of Tillemont (particularly tom vi viii and ix.)

69 Dr Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History vol iv p 78) has already conceived and intimated the same suspicion

70 This reflection is so obvious and forcible that Orosius (I vii c 32 33) delays the persecution till after the death of Valentinian Socrates on the other hand supposes (I iii [iv] c 32) that it was appeased by a philosophical oration which Themistius pronounced in the year 374 (Orat xii p 134 in Latin only) Such contradictions diminish the evidence and reduce the term of the persecution of Valens

71 Tillemont whom I follow and abridge has extracted (Mém. Ecclési tom viii p. 153-167) the most authentic circumstances from the Panegyrics of the two Gregories the brother and the friend of Basil The letters of Basil himself (Dupin, Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique tom ii § 155 180) do not present the image of a very lively persecution

72 Basilus Caesariensis episcopus Cappas locum clarum habetur qui multa continentur et ingenu bona uno superbia nialo perdidit (Chron

Ann 2392, tom viii p 816, ed Vallars ] This irreverent passage is perfectly in the style and character of St Jerom. It does not appear in Scaliger's edition of his Chronicle, but Isaac Vossius found it in some old MSS which had not been reformed by the monks.

73 This noble and charitable foundation (almost a new city) surpassed in merit, if not in greatness, the pyramids, or the walls of Babylon. It was principally intended for the reception of lepers (Greg Nazianzen Orat xx p 439).

74 Cod Theodos I vii tit 1 leg 63 Godefroy (tom iv p 409-413) performs the duty of a commentator and advocate Tillemont (Mém Ecclési tom viii p 808) supposes a second law to excuse his orthodox friends, who had misrepresented the edict of Valens, and suppressed the liberty of choice.

75 See D'Anville, Description de l'Egypte, p 74. Hereafter I shall consider the monastic institutions.

76 Socrates, I iv c 24, 25 Orosius, I vii c 33 Jerom in Chron p 189 [tom. viii p 816, ed Vallars ], and tom ii p 212. The monks of Egypt performed many miracles, which prove the truth of their faith. Right, says Jortin (Remarks, vol iv p 79), but what proves the truth of those miracles?

77 Cod Theodos I xvi tit 1 leg 20 Godefroy (tom vi p 49), after the example of Baronius, impartially collects all that the fathers have said on the subject of this important law, whose spirit was long afterwards revived by the emperor Fredenc II, Edward I of England, and other Christian princes who reigned after the twelfth century.

78 The expressions which I have used are temperate and feeble, if compared with the vehement invectives of Jerom (tom i p 13, 45, 144, etc [tom i p 259, etc, ed Vallars ]). In his turn he was reproached with the guilt which he imputed to his brother monks and the Sceleratus, the Versipellis, was publicly accused as the lover of the widow Paula (tom ii p 363). He undoubtedly possessed the affections both of the mother and the daughter, but he declares that he never abused his influence to any selfish or sensual purpose.

79 Pudet dicere, sacerdotes idolorum, mimi et auriga, et scorta, hereditates capiunt solis clerici ac monachi hâc [hoc] lege prohibetur. Et non prohibetur a persecutoribus, sed a principibus Christianis. Nec de lege queror, sed doleo cur meruerint hanc legem. Jerom (tom i p 13 [tom i p 258, ed Vallars ]) discreetly insinuates the secret policy of his patron Damasus.

80 Three words of Jerom, sancte memoria Damasus (tom ii p 109 [Ep ad Pammachium tom i p 228, ed Vallars ]), wash away all his stains, and blind the devout eyes of Tillemont (Mém Ecclési tom viii p 386-424).

81 Jerom himself is forced to allow, crudeliter interfectiones diversi sexus perpetrare (in Chron p 186 [tom viii p 800 ed Vallars ]). But an original libel or petition of two presbyters of the adverse party has unaccountably escaped They affirm that the doors of the basilica were burnt, and that the roof was untiled that Damasus marched at the head of his own clergy, gravediggers, charioteers, and hired gladiators that none of his party were killed, but that one hundred and sixty dead bodies were found. This petition is published by the P Sirmond, in the first volume of his works.

82 The Basilica of Sicinius, or Liberius, is probably the church of Sancta Maria Maggiore, on the Esquiline hill Baronius, A D 367, No 3, and Donatus, Roma Antiqua et Nova, I iv c 3, p 462.

83 The enemies of Damasus styled him Auriscalpus Matronarum, the ladies' ear scratcher.

84 Gregory Nazianzen (Orat xxxii p 526) describes the pride and luxury of the prelates who reigned in the Imperial cities, their gilt car, fiery steeds, numerous train, etc. The crowd gave way as to a wild beast.

85 Ammian xxvii 3 Perpetuo Numini, utrisque ejus cultoribus. The incomparable pliancy of a polytheist!

86 Ammianus, who makes a fair report of his prefecture (xxvii 9), styles him præclaræ indolis, gravitatisque, senator (xxvii 7, and Vales ad loc). A curious inscription (Gruter MCII No 2) records, in two columns, his religious and civil honours. In one line he was Pontiff of the Sun and of Vesta, Augur, Quindecimvir, Hierophant, etc, etc. In the other, 1 Quæstor candidatus, more probably titular 2 Prætor 3 Corrector of Tuscan and Umbria 4 Consular of Lusitania 5 Proconsul of Achaia 6 Prefect of Rome 7 Prætorian præfect of Italy 8 Of Illyricum 9 Consul, elect, but he died before the beginning of the year 385. See Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 241, 736.

87 Facite me Romanæ urbis episcopum, et ero protinus Christianus (Jerom, tom ii p 165 [contra Joann Ierosol tom ii p 415, ed Vallars ]). It is more than probable that Damasus would not have purchased his conversion at such a price.

88 Ammian xxvi 5 Valesius adds a long and good note on the master of the offices.

89 Ammian xxvii 1 Zosimus, I iv [c 9] p 208. The disgrace of the Batrians is suppressed by the contemporary soldier, from a regard for military honour, which could not affect a Greek rhetorician of the succeeding age.

90 See D'Anville, Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, p 587. The name of the Moselle, which is not specified by Ammianus is clearly understood by Mascou (Hist. of the Ancient Germans, vii 2).

91 The brittles are described by Ammianus (xxvii 2) and by Zosimus (I iv [c 9] p 209), who supposes Valentinian to have been present.

92 Studio sollicitante nostrorum, occubuit Ammian xxvii 10.

93 The expedition of Valentinian is related by Ammianus (xxvii. 10), and celebrated by Auson nus (Mosell 421 etc.) who foolishly supposes that the Romans were ignorant of the sources of the Danube

94 Immanis enim natio jam inde ab incunabulis primis varietate casuum immutata ita sæpius adolescit ut fuisse longis sæculis æstimeretur intacta. Ammian xxviii 5 The Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l'Europe tom vi p 370) ascribes the fecundity of the Alemanni to their easy adoption of strangers

95 Ammian xxviii 2 Zosimus i iv [c 16] p 214 The younger Victor mentions the mechanical genius of Valentinian nova arma meditari fingere terræ seu limo simulacra [Epist c 45]

96 Bellicosos et pubis immensæ viribus affluentes et ideo metuendos finitimus universis Ammian xxviii 5

97 I am always apt to suspect historians and travellers of improving extraordinary facts into general laws Ammianus ascribes a similar custom to Egypt and the Chinese have imputed it to the Tsün or Roman empire (De Guignes Hist des Huns tom ii part i p 79)

98 Salinarum finiumque causâ Alemanni sæpe jurgabant Ammian xxviii 5 Possibly they disputed the possession of the Sala a river which produced salt and which had been the object of ancient contention Tacit Annal xiii 57 and Lappinus ad loc

99 Jam inde temporibus priscis sobolem se esse Romanam Burgundi sciunt and the vague tradition gradually assumed a more regular form (Oros i vii c 32) It is annihilated by the decisive authority of Pliny who composed the History of Drusus and served in Germany (Plin Secund Epist iii 5) within sixty years after the death of that hero Germanorum genera quinque Vindili quorum pars Burgundiones etc (Hist Natur iv 28)

100 The wars and negotiations relative to the Burgundians and Alemanni are distinctly related by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxviii 5 xxiv 4 xxx 3) Orosius (i vii c 32) and the Chronicles of Jerom and Cassiodorus fix some dates and add some circumstances

101 Ἐν τῇ ῥῇ ἀκτὶ αὐτῆς Καίσιβρις ἔσται πόλις At the northern extremity of the peninsula (the Cimbric promontory of Pliny iv 27) Ptolemy fixes the remnant of the Cimbri He fills the interval between the Saxons and the Cimbri with six obscure tribes who were united as early as the sixth century under the national appellation of Dævi See Cluver German. Antiq. i. iii. c 21 22 23

102 M. d'Anville (Etablissement des Etats de l'Europe etc. pp 19-26) has marked the extensive limits of the Saxony of Charlemagne

103 The fleet of Drusus had failed in their attempt to pass or even to approach the Sound (styled from an obvious resemblance the Columns of Hercules) and the naval enterprise was never resumed (Tacit de Moribus German. c 33) The knowledge which the Romans acquired of the naval powers of the Baltic (c 44 45) was obtained by their land journeys in search of amber

104 Quin et Arcmorius piratæ Sæta tractat Sperabat cui pelle salum sulcare Britannum Ludus et assuto glaucum mare fodere lembo

Sidon in Panegy. Avit 369. The genius of Caesar imitated for a particular set vice these rude but light vessels which were likewise used by the natives of Britain (Comment de Bell. Civil. i 54 and Guichardt Nouveaux Mémoires Militaires tom ii p 41 42) The British vessels would now astonish the genius of Cæsar

105 The best original account of the Saxon pirates may be found in Sidonius Apollinaris (l. vii. Epist. ii p 223 edit Sirmond) and the best commentary in the Abbé du Bos (Hist. Critique de la Monarchie Française etc. tom i l. i. c 16 p. 148-155 See likewise p 77 78)

106 Ammian (xxviii 5) justifies this breach of faith to pirates and robbers and Orosius (l. vi. c. 32) more clearly expresses their real guilt virtutis atque agilitate terribiles

107 Symmachus (l. ii Epist. 46) still presumes to mention the sacred names of Socrates and philosophy Sidonius bishop of Clermont, might condemn (l. viii Epist. 6) with less inconsistency the human sacrifices of the Saxons

108 In the beginning of the last century the learned Camden was obliged to undermine with respectful scepticism the romance of Brutus the Trojan who is now buried in silent oblivion with Scota the daughter of Pharaoh, and her numerous progeny Yet I am informed that some champions of the Milesian colony may still be found among the original natives of Ireland A people dissatisfied with their present condition grasp at any visions of their past or future glory

109 Tacitus or rather his father in law Agricola might remark the German or Spanish complexion of some British tribes But it was their sober deliberate opinion In universum tamquam æstumanti Gallis vicinum solum occupasse credibile est Eorum sacra deprehendas sermo habet multum diversus (in Vit. Agricola. c. 21) Cæsar had observed their common religion (Comment. de Bello Gallico vi 13) and in his time the emigration from the Belgic Gaul was a recent or at least an historical event (v 12) Camden, the British Strabo has modestly ascertained our genuine antiquities (Britannia vol. I. Introduction, p li-xxxi)

110 In the dark and doubtful paths of Caledonian antiquity I have chosen for my guides two learned and ingenious Highlanders, whom birth and education had peculiarly qualified for that office See Critical Disquisitions on the Origin Antiquities etc of the Caledonians, by Dr John Macpherson London 1768 in 4to and Introduction to the History of Great Britain and

Ireland, by James Macpherson, Esq., London, 1773, in 4to third edit Dr Macpherson was a minister in the Isle of Skye and it is a circumstance honourable for the present age, that a work replete with erudition and criticism should have been composed in the most remote of the Hebrides

111 The Irish descent of the Scots has been revived, in the last moments of its decay, and strenuously supported, by the Rev Mr Whitaker (Hist of Manchester, vol 1 p 430, 431, and Genuine History of the Britons asserted, etc., p 154-293) Yet he acknowledges, 1. That the Scots of Ammianus Marcellinus (A D 340) were already settled in Caledonia, and that the Roman authors do not afford any hints of their emigration from another country 2. That all the accounts of such emigrations, which have been asserted or received, by Irish bards, Scotch historians, or English antiquaries (Buchanan, Camden, Usher, Stillingfleet, etc.), are totally fabulous 3. That three of the Irish tribes, which are mentioned by Ptolemy (A D 150), were of Caledonian extraction 4. That a younger branch of Caledonian princes, of the house of Fingal, acquired and possessed the monarchy of Ireland. After these concessions, the remaining difference between Mr Whitaker and his adversaries is minute and obscure The genuine history, which he produces, of a Fergus, the cousin of Ossian, who was transplanted (A D 324) from Ireland to Caledonia, is built on a conjectural supplement to the Erse poetry, and the feeble evidence of Richard of Curenchester, a monk of the fourteenth century The lively spirit of the learned and ingenious antiquarian has tempted him to forget the nature of a question which he so vehemently debates, and so absolutely decides

114 The Caledonians praised and coveted the gold, the steeds, the lights, etc., of the stranger See Dr Blair's Dissertation on Ossian, vol. ii. p 343, and Mr Macpherson's Introduction, p 242-286

115 Lord Lyttelton has circumstantially related (History of Henry II vol. 1 p 182) and Sir David Dalrymple has slightly mentioned (Annals of Scotland, vol 1 p 69), a barbarous inroad of the Scots, at a time (A D 1137) when law, religion, and society must have softened their primitive manners

116 Attacottu bellicosa hominum natio Ammian xxvii 8 Camden (Introduct p cii) has restored their true name in the text of Jerom The bands of Attacottu which Jerom had seen in Gaul were afterwards stationed in Italy and Illyricum (Notitia, S viii xxxix v)

117 Cum ipse adolescentulus in Galliâ viderim Attacottos (or Scotos) gentem Britannicam humanis vesci carnibus, et cum per silvas porcorum greges, et armentorum pecudumque reperiant, pastorum nates et feminarum papillas solere ab scindere et has solas ciborum delicias arbitrari Such is the evidence of Jerom (tom ii p 75 [adv Jovinianum, l ii tom ii p 335, ed Vallars]), whose veracity I find no reason to question

118 Ammianus has concisely represented (xx. 1, xxvi 4, xxviii 8, xxviii 3) the whole series of the British war

See likewise Pacatus (in Panegyrt Vet xii 5) But it is not easy to appreciate the intrinsic value of flattery and metaphor Compare the British victories of Bolanus (Statius, Silv v 2) with his real character (Tacit in Vit Agricola c. 16)

120 Ammianus frequently mentions their concilium annuum, legitimum, etc Leptis and Sabrata are long since ruined, but the city of Oea, the native country of Apuleius, still flourishes under the provincial denomination of Tripoli See Cellarius (Geograph Antiqua, tom ii part ii. p 81), D Anville (Géographie Ancienne, tom. iii p 71, 72), and Marmol (Afrique, tom. ii p 562)

121 Ammian xxviii 8 Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 25 676) has discussed the chronological difficulties of the history of Count Romanus

122 The chronology of Ammianus is loose and obscure and Orosius (l vii c 33, p 551, edit Havercamp) seems to place the revolt of Firmus after the death of Valentian and Valens Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom v p 691) endeavours to pick his way The patient and sure footed mule of the Alps may be trusted in the most slippery paths

123 Ammian xxix. 5. The text of this long chapter (fifteen quarto pages) is broken and corrupted and the narrative is perplexed by the want of chronological and geographical landmarks

124 Ammian xxviii 4. Orosius, l vii c 33 p 551, 552 Jerom in Chron p 187

125 Leo Africanus (in the Viaggi di Ramusio tom 1 fol 78-83) has traced a curious picture of the people and the country, which are more minutely described in the Afrique de Marmol tom iii p 1-54

126 This uninhabitable zone was gradually reduced by the improvements of ancient geography from forty five to twenty four or even sixteen degrees of latitude See a learned and judicious note of Dr Robertson Hist of America vol 1 p 426

127 Intra credere libet vix jam homines et magis semiferi Blemmyes Satyri etc Pomponius Mela i 4 p 26 edit Voss in Svo Pliny philosophically explains (vi 35) the irregularities of nature which he had credulously admitted (v 8)

128 If the satyr was the orang-outang the great human ape (Buffon Hist Nat tom xiv p 43 etc) one of that species might actually be shown alive at Alexandria in the reign of Constantine Yet some difficulty will still remain about the conversation which St Anthony held with one of these pious savages in the desert of Thebais (Jerom in Vit Paul Eremit tom 1 p 238)

129 St Anthony likewise met one of these monsters whose existence was seriously asserted by the emperor Claudius The public laughed but his prefect of Egypt had the address to send an artful preparation the embalmed corpse of an Hyppocentaur which was preserved almost a century afterwards in the Imperial palace See Pliny (Hist Natur vii 3) and the judicious observations of Fréret (Mémoires de l'Acad tom vii p 321 etc)

130 The fable of the pygmies as old as Homer (Iliad iii 6) The pygmies of India and Atlupia were (trupithami) twenty seven inches high Every spring their cavalry (mounted on rams and goats) marched in battle array to destroy the cranes eggs aliter (says Pliny) futuris gregibus non resisti Their houses were built of mud feathers and egg shells See Pliny (vi 35 vii 2) and Strabo (L ii p 121 [p 70 ed Casaub])

132 Histoire Philosophique et Politique etc tom iv p 192

133 The evidence of Ammianus is original and decisive (xxvii 12) Moses of Chorene (i iii c 17 p 249 and c 34 p 269) and Procopius (de Bell. Persico l i c 5, p 17 edit Louvre (tom i p 29 ed Bonn)) have been consulted but those historians who confound distinct facts repeat the same events and introduce strange stories must be used with diffidence and caution

134 Perhaps Artagera, or Ardis under whose walls Ca the grandson of Augustus was wounded, Th fortress was situate above Arusa near one of the sources of the Tigris See D Anville Géographie Ancienne tom ii p 107

135 Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom v p 701) proves from chronology that Olympias must have been the mother of Iara.

136 Ammianus (xxvii 11 xxix i xxx i 2) has described the events without the dates of the Persian war Moses of Chorene (Hist. Armen. l iii p 28 p 261 c 31 p 266 c 35 p 271) affords some additional facts but it is extremely difficult to separate truth from fable

137 Artaxerxes was the successor and (the cousin german) of the great Sapor and guardian of his son Sapor III (Agathias l iv [c 26] p 136 edit Louvre [p 63 ed Bonn]) See the Universal History vol xi p 86 161 The authors of that unequal work have compiled the Sassanian dynasty with erudition and diligence but it is a preposterous arrangement to divide the Roman and Oriental accounts into two distinct histories

138 Pacatus in Panegyrt Vet xii 22 and Orosius l vii c 34. Ictumque tum fœdus est quæ versus Oriens usque ad nunc (A D 416) tranquille fruitur

139 See in Ammianus (xxx. 1) the adventures of Para Moses of Chorene calls him Tiridates and tells a long and not improbable story of his son Gnelus who afterwards made himself popular in Armenia and provoked the jealousy of the reigning king (l iii c 21 etc p 253 etc) (Para is not the same as Tiridates who was the father of Gnel, first husband of Pharandem the future wife of Arsaces and the mother of Para)

140 The concise account of the reign and conquests of Hermanric seems to be one of the valuable fragments which Jornandes (c 29) borrowed from the Gothic histories of Ablavius, or Cassiodorus

141 M de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l'Europe tom vi p 311-329) investigates with more industry than success the nations subdued by the arms of Hermanric He denies the existence of the Iannobronce on account of the immoderate length of their name Yet the French envoy to Rastibon, or Dresden must have traversed the country of the Aled amatricæ

142 The edition of Grotius (Jornandes p 641) exhibits the name of Ætini But reason and the Ambrosian MS have restored the Ætini whose manners and situation are expressed by the pencil of Tacitus (Germania = 45)

143 Ammianus (xxxi 3) observes in general terms Ermentrichi bellicosissimi Regis, et per multa varique fortiter facta vicinis gentibus commutati etc

144 Valens docetur relationibus Ducum gentem Gothorum eâ tempestate intactam abroque servissimam conspiciantem in unum ad pervadenda parari collimitia Thraciarum. Ammianus xxvi 6

145 M de Buat (Hist. des Peuples de l'Europe tom vi p 332) has curiously ascertained the real number of these auxiliaries The 3000 of Ammianus and the 10 000 of Zosimus were only the first divisions of the Gothic army

146. The march and subsequent negotiation are described in the Fragments of Eunapius (Excerpt Legat. p 18, edit Louvre [p 47, ed Bonn]) The provincials, who afterwards became familiar with the barbarians, found that their strength was more apparent than real They were tall of stature, but their legs were clumsy and their shoulders were narrow

147 Valens enim, ut consulto placuerat fratri, cujus regebatur arbitrio, arma concussit in Gothos ratione iusta pernotus Ammianus (xxvii 4) then proceeds to describe, not the country of the Goths, but the peaceful and obedient province of Thrace, which was not affected by the war

148 Eunapius, in Excerpt Legat p 18, 19 [p 47, 48, ed Bonn] The Greek sophist must have been considered as one and the same war, the whole series of Gothic history till the victories and peace of Theodosius

149 The Gothic war is described by Ammianus (xxvii 5), Zosimus (l iv [c 10] p 211-214), and Themistius (Orat x p 129-141) The orator Themistius was sent from the senate of Constantinople to congratulate the victorious emperor, and his servile eloquence compares Valens on the Danube to Achilles in the Scamander Jornandes forgets a war peculiar to the Vni Goths, and inglorious to the Gothic name (Mascou's Hist of the Germans, vii 3)

150 Ammianus (xxix 6) and Zosimus (l iv [c 16] p 219, 220) carefully mark the origin and progress of the Quadic and Sarmatian war

151 Ammianus (xxx 5), who acknowledges the merit, has censured, with becoming asperity, the oppressive administration of Petronius Probus When Jerom translated and continued the Chronicle of Eusebius (A D 380, see Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xii p 53, 626), he expressed the truth or at least the public opinion of his country, in the following words "Probus P P Illyrici iniquissimis tributorum exactionibus, ante provincias quas regebat, quam a Barbaris vastarentur, erant" (Chron edit Scaliger, p 187, Animadvers p 259) The saint afterwards formed an intimate and tender friendship with the widow of Probus and the name of Count Equitius, with less propriety, but without much injustice, has been substituted in the text

152 Julian (Orat vi p 198) represents his friend Iphicles as a man of virtue and merit, who had made himself ridiculous and unhappy by adopting the extravagant dress and manners of the Cynics

153 Ammian xxx 5 Jerom, who exaggerates the misfortune of Valentinian, refuses him even this last consolation of revenge Vastato genitali solo, et inultam patriam derelinquens (tom i p 26 [Ep ad Heliodor tom i p 341, ed Vallars])

154 See, on the death of Valentinian, Ammianus (xxx 6), Zosimus (l vi [c 17] p 221), Victor (in Epitom [c 45]), Socrates (l iv c 31), and Jerom (in Chron p 187 [tom viii p 815 ed Vallars]), and tom i p 26, ad Heliodor [tom i p 341, ed Vallars]) There is much variety of circumstances among them, and Ammianus is so eloquent that he writes nonsense

155 Socrates (l iv c 31) is the only original witness of this foolish story, so repugnant to the laws and manners of the Romans, that it scarcely deserved the formal and elaborate dissertation of M Bonamy (Mém de l'Académie, tom xxx p 394-405) Yet I would preserve the natural circumstance of the bath, instead of following Zosimus, who represents Justina as an old woman, the widow of Magnentius

156 Ammianus (xxvii 6) describes the form of this military election, and august investiture Valentinian does not appear to have consulted, or even informed, the senate of Rome

157 Ammianus, xxx 10 Zosimus, l iv [c 19] p 222, 223 Tillemont has proved (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 707-709) that Gratian reigned in Italy, Africa and Illyricum I have endeavoured to express his authority over his brother's dominions, as he used it, in an ambiguous style

Chapter XXVI

1 Such is the bad taste of Ammianus (xxvi 10), that it is not easy to distinguish his facts from his metaphors Yet he positively affirms that he saw the rotten carcass of a ship ad secundam lapidem, at Methone, or Modon, in Peloponnesus

2 The earthquakes and inundations are variously described by Libanius (Orat de ulciscendâ Juliani nece, in Fabricius, Bibl Græc. tom vii p 158, with a learned note of Olearius), Zosimus (l iv [c 18] p 221), Sozomen (l vi c 2), Cedrenus (p 310, 314 [tom i p 543, 550 ed Bonn]), and Jerom (in Chron p 186 [tom viii p 809 ed Vallars]), and tom i p 250 in Vit Hilariion [tom ii p 36 ed Vallars]) Epidaurus must have been overwhelmed, had not the prudent citizens placed St Hilarion, an Egyptian monk on the beach He made the sign of the cross, the mountain wave stopped, bowed, and returned

3 Diocærchus the Peripatetic composed a formal treatise to prove this obvious truth which is not the most honourable to the human species (Cicero de Officiis, ii 5)

4 The original Scythians of Herodotus (l iv c 47-57 99-101) were confined by the Danube and the Palus Mæotis within a square of 4000 stadia (400 Roman miles) See D Anville (Mém de l'Académie tom xxxv p 573-581) Diodorus Siculus (tom i l ii [c 43] p 155 edit Weseling) has marked the gradual progress of the new and nation.

5 The Tatars or Tartars were a primitive tribe the rivals and at length the subjects of the Moguls. In the victorious armies of Zingis Khan and his successors the Tartars formed the vanguard and the name which first reached the ears of foreigners was applied to the whole nation (Fréret in the Hist de l'Académie tom xviii p 60). In speaking of all or any of the northern shepherds of Europe or Asia I indifferently use the appellations of Scythians or Tartars.

6 Imperium Asiae ter quæsivere ipsi perpetuo ab alieno imperio aut intacti aut invicti mansere. Since the time of Justin (u 3) they have multiplied this account Voltaire in a few words (tom x p 64, Hist Générale = 136) has abridged the Tartar conquests.

Oft o'er the trembling nations from afar

Has Scythia breath'd the living cloud of war

7 The fourth book of Herodotus affords a curious though imperfect portrait of the Scythians. Among the moderns who describe the uniform scene the Khan of Khwarezm Abulghazi Bahadur expresses his native feelings and his Genealogical History of the Tatars has been copiously illustrated by the French and English editors Carpin Ascelin and Rubruquis (in the Hist des Voyages tom vii) represent the Moguls of the fourteenth century. To these guides I have added Gerbillon and the other Jesuits (Description de la Chine par D. Halde tom iv) who accurately surveyed the Chinese Tartary and that honest and intelligent traveller Bell of Antermomy (two volumes in 4to Glasgow 1763).

8 The Uzbeks are the most altered from their primitive manners: 1 by the profession of the Mahometan religion and 2 by the possession of the cities and harvests of the Great Bucharia.

9 Il est certain que les grands mangeurs de viande sont en général cruels et sévères plus que les autres hommes. Cette observation est de tous les lieux et de tous les tems la barbare Anglaise est connue etc. Emile de Rousseau tom. i p 274. Whatever we may think of the general observation we shall not easily allow the truth of his example. The good natured complaints of Plutarch and the pathetic lamentations of Ovid seduce our reason by exciting our sensibility.

10 These Tartar emigrations have been discovered by M. de Guignes (Histoire des Huns tom. i. ii) a skilful and laborious interpreter of the Chinese language whom has thus laid open new and important scenes in the history of mankind.

11 A plain in the Chinese Tartary only eighty leagues from the great wall was found by the missionaries to be three thousand geometrical paces above the level of the sea. Montesquieu who has used and abused the relations of travellers deduces the revolutions of Asia from this important circumstance that heat and cold weakness and strength touch each other without any temperate zone (The Spirit of Laws l. xvii c. 3).

■ Petit de la Croix (Vie de Gengiscan l. iii. c.

7) represents the full glory and extent of the Mogul chase. The Jesuits Gerbillon and Verbiest followed the emperor Kamhi when he hunted in Tartary (Du Halde Description de la Chine tom. iv p 81 290 etc. folio edit.) His grandson Kien-long who unites the Tartar discipline with the laws and learning of China describes (Eloge de Moukden = 273-285) as a poet the pleasures which he had often enjoyed as a sportsman.

13 See the second volume of the Genealogical History of the Tartars and the lists of the Khans at the end of the life of Gengis or Zingis. Under the reign of Timur or Tamerlane one of his subjects, a descendant of Zingis still bore the regal appellation of Khan and the conqueror of Asia contented himself with the title of Emur or Sultan Abulghazi part v c 4 D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale p 878.

14 See the Diets of the ancient Huns (De Guignes tom. ii p 26) and a curious description of those of Zingis (Vie de Gengiscan l. i c 6 l. ii c 11). Such assemblies are frequently mentioned in the Persian history of Timur though they served only to countenance the resolutions of their master.

15 Montesquieu labours to explain a difference which has not existed between the liberty of the Arabs and the perpetual slavery of the Tartars (The Spirit of Laws l. xvii c 5 l. xviii c. 19 etc.).

16 Abulghazi Khan in the two first parts of his Genealogical History relates the miserable labors and traditions of the Uzbek Tartars concerning the times which preceded the reign of Zingis.

17 In the thirteenth book of the Iliad Jupiter turns away his eyes from the bloody fields of Troy to the plains of Thrace and Scythia. We would not by changing the prospect behold a more peaceful or innocent scene.

18 Thucydides l. ii c 97.

19 See the fourth book of Herodotus. When Darius advanced into the Moldavian desert, between the Danube and the Dniester the king of the Scythians sent him a mouse a frog a bird and five arrows a tremendous allegory!

20 These wars and heroes may be found under their respective titles in the Bibliothèque Orientale of D Herbelot. They have been celebrated in an epic poem of sixty thousand rhymed couplets, by Ferdusi the Homer of Persia. See the history of Nadir Shah p 145 165. The public must lament that Mr Jones has suspended the pursuit of Oriental learning.

21 The Caspian Sea with its rivers and adjacent tribes are laboriously illustrated in the Examen Critique des Histoires d'Alexandre which compares the true geography and the errors produced by the vanity or ignorance of the Greeks.

22 The original seat of the nation appears to have been in the north west of China in the provinces of Chenai and Chanai. Under the two first dynasties the principal town was still a movable camp: the villages were thinly scattered more land was employed in pasture than in tillage the exten-

cise of hunting was ordained to clear the country from wild beasts, Petcheli (where Peking stands) was a desert, and the southern provinces were peopled with Indian savages. The dynasty of the Han (before Christ 206) gave the empire its actual form and extent.

23 The era of the Chinese monarchy has been variously fixed from 2952 to 2132 years before Christ, and the year 2637 has been chosen for the lawful epoch by the authority of the present emperor. The difference arises from the uncertain duration of the two first dynasties, and the vacant space that lies beyond them, as far as the real, or fabulous, times of Fohi or Hoangti Sematsien dates his authentic chronology from the year 841, the thirty six eclipses of Confucius (thirty one of which have been verified) were observed between the years 722 and 480 before Christ. The historical period of China does not ascend above the Greek Olympiads.

24 After several ages of anarchy and despotism, the dynasty of the Han (before Christ 206) was the era of the revival of learning. The fragments of ancient literature were restored, the characters were improved and fixed, and the future preservation of books was secured by the useful inventions of ink, paper, and the art of printing. Ninety seven years before Christ, Sematsien published the first history of China. His labours were illustrated and continued by a series of one hundred and eighty historians. The substance of their works is still extant, and the most considerable of them are now deposited in the king of France's library.

25 China has been illustrated by the labours of the French, of the missionaries at Peking, and Messrs Fréret and De Guignes at Paris. The substance of the three preceding notes is extracted from the Chou king, with the preface and notes of M de Guignes, Paris, 1770, The Tong-kien Kang-Mou, translated by the P de Mailla, under the name of Hist Générale de la Chine, tom. i p xlix-cc, the Mémoires sur la Chine, Paris, 1776, etc., tom. i p 1-323, tom. ii p 5-364, the Histoire des Huns, tom. i p 1-131, tom. v p 345-362, and the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. x p 377-402, tom. xi p 495-564, tom. xiii p 178-295, tom. xxxvi p 164-238.

26 See the Histoire Générale des Voyages, tom. xiii, and the Genealogical History, vol. ii p 620-664.

27 M de Guignes (tom. ii p 1-124) has given the original history of the ancient Hiong nou, or Huns. The Chinese geography of their country (tom. i part ii p lv-lxiii) seems to comprise a part of their conquests.

28 See in Du Halde (tom. iv p 18-65) a circumstantial description, with a correct map, of the country of the Mongous.

29 The Igours or Vigours were divided into three branches—hunters, shepherds and husbandmen, and the last class was despised by the two former. See Abulghazi, part ii c 7.

30 Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxv p 17-33. The comprehensive view of M de Guignes has compared these distant events.

31 The fame of Sovou, or So-ou, his merit, and his singular adventures, are still celebrated in China. See the Eloge de Moulken, p 20, and notes, p 241-247, and Mémoires sur la Chine, tom. iii p 317-360.

32 See Isbrand Ives in Harris's Collection, vol. ii p 931, Bell's Travels, vol. i p 247-254, and Gmelin in the Hist Générale des Voyages, tom. xviii p 283-329. They all remark the vulgar opinion, that the holy sea grows angry and tempestuous if any one presumes to call it a lake. This grammatical nicety often excites a dispute between the absurd superstition of the mariners and the absurd obstinacy of travellers.

33 The construction of the wall of China is mentioned by Du Halde (tom. ii p 45) and De Guignes (tom. ii p 59).

34 See the life of Lieoupang, or Kaoti, in the Hist de la Chine, published at Paris, 1777, etc., tom. i p 442-522. This voluminous work is the translation (by the P de Mailla) of the Tong-kien Kang-Mou, the celebrated abridgment of the great History of Semakouang (A D 1084) and his continuators.

35 See a free and ample memorial, presented by a Mandarin to the emperor Ventu (before Christ 180-157), in Du Halde (tom. ii p 412-426), from a collection of State papers, marked with the red pencil by Kambu himself (p 384-612). Another memorial from the minister of war (Kang-Mou, tom. ii p 555) supplies some curious circumstances of the manners of the Huns.

36 A supply of women is mentioned as a customary article of treaty and tribute (Hist de la Conquete de la Chine par les Tartares Mntcheoux, tom. i p 186, 187, with the note of the editor).

37 De Guignes, Hist des Huns, tom. ii p 62.

38 See the reign of the emperor Vouti, in the Kang Mou tom. iii p 1-98. His various and inconsistent character seems to be impartially drawn.

39 This expression is used in the memorial to the emperor Ventu (Du Halde, tom. ii p 417). Without adopting the exaggerations of Marco Polo and Isaac Vossius, we may rationally allow for Peking two millions of inhabitants. The cities of the south, which contain the manufactures of China, are still more populous.

40 See the Kang Mou, tom. iii p 150, and the subsequent events under the proper years. This memorable festival is celebrated in the Eloge de Moulken, and explained in a note by the P Grubel, p 89, 90.

41 This inscription was composed on the spot by Pankou President of the Tribunal of History (Kang Mou tom. iii p 392). Similar monuments have been discovered in many parts of Tartary (Hist oues des Huns, tom. ii p 122).

42 M de Guignes (tom 1 p 189) has inserted a short account of the Siensi

43 The era of the Huns is placed by the Chinese 1210 years before Christ Put the series of their kings does not commence till the year 230 (Hist des Huns tom II p 21 123)

44 The various accidents of the downfall and flight of the Huns are related in the Kang Mou tom III p 88 91 95 139 etc The small numbers of each horde may be ascribed to their losses and divisions

45 M de Guignes has skilfully traced the foot steps of the Huns through the vast deserts of Tartary (tom II p 123 277 etc 325 etc)

46 Mohammed sultan of Carizme reigned in Sogdiana when it was invaded (A D 1218) by Zingis and his Moguls The Oriental historians (see D Herbelot Petit de la Croix etc) celebrate the populous cities which he ruined and the fruitful country which he desolated In the next century the same provinces of Chorasmia and Mawarannahr were described by Abulfeda (Hudson Geograph Minor tom III) Their actual misery may be seen in the Genealogical History of the Tartars p 423-489

47 Justin (xli 6) has left a short abridgment of the Greek kings of Bactriana To their industry I should ascribe the new and extraordinary trade which transported the merchandises of India into Europe by the Oxus the Caspian the Cyrus the Phasis and the Euxine The other ways both of the land and sea were possessed by the Seleucides and the Ptolemies (See l Esprit des Loix I xxi)

48 Procopius de Bell Persico I 1 c 3 p 9 [tom I p 16 ed Bonn]

49 In the thirteenth century the monk Rubruquis (who traversed the immense plain of Kipzak in his journey to the court of the Great Khan) observed the remarkable name of Ungary with the traces of a common language and origin (Hist des Voyages tom VII p 269)

50 Bell (vol I p 29-34) and the editors of the Genealogical History (p 539) have described the Calmucks of the Volga in the beginning of the present century

51 This great transmigration of 300 000 Calmucks or Torgouts happened in the year 1771 The original narrative of Hsien long the reigning emperor of China which was intended for the inscription of a column has been translated by the missionaries of Peking (Mémoires sur la Chine tom I p 401-418) The emperor affects the smooth and specious language of the Son of Heaven and the Father of his People

52 The Kang Mou (tom III p 447) ascribes to their conquests a space of 14 000 li According to the present standard 200 li (or more accurately 193) are equal to one li of gree of latitude and one English mile consequently exceeds three miles of China But there are strong reasons to believe that the ancient li scarcely equalled one half of the

53 See the Histoire des Huns tom II p 123 144 The subsequent history (p 145-277) of three or four Hunnic dynasties evidently proves that their martial spirit was not impaired by a long residence in China

54 Utque hominibus quietis in plectis otium est voluptabile ita illos pericula juvant et bella Judicator ibi beatus qui in prelio profuderit animam sen scentes etiam et fortuitis mortibus munda digressos ut degeneres et ignaves conviciis atrocibus insectantur (Ammian xxvi 2) We must think highly of the conquerors of such men

55 On the subject of the Alani see Ammianus (xxvi 2) Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis c 24) M de Guignes (Hist des Huns tom II p 279) and the Genealogical History of the Tartars (tom II p 617)

56 As we are possessed of the authentic history of the Huns it would be impertinent to repeat or to refute the fables which misrepresent their origin and progress their passage of the mud or water of the Meotus in pursuit of an ox or stag les Indes qu'ils avoient découvertes etc (Zosimus I iv c 20) p 274 Sozomen I vi c 37 Procopius Hist Miscell c 5 Jornandes c 24 Grandeur et Décadence etc des Romains p 17)

57 Prodigiosa formæ et pandi ut bipedes ex istis bestias vel quales in commarginandis potibus effirmati stipites dolantur incompti Ammianus xxxi 2 Jornandes (c 24) draws a strong caricature of a Calmuck face Species pavenda nigredine quædam deformis offa non facies habensque magis puncta quam lumina See Buffon, Hist Naturelle tom III p 380

58 This execrable origin which Jornandes (c 24) describes with the rancour of a Goth, might be originally derived from a more pleasing fable of the Greeks (Herodot I iv c 9 etc)

59 The Rovelani may be the fathers of the Povs the Russians (D Anville Empire de Russie p 1-10) whose residence (A D 862) about Novogrod Veliki cannot be very remote from that which the Geographer of Ravenna (I III iv 4 46 v 28, 30) assigns to the Rovelani (A D 886)

60 The text of Ammianus seems to be imperfect or corrupt but the nature of the ground explains and almost defines the Gothic rampart. Mémoires de l Académie etc tom xxviii p 444-462

61 M de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l Europe tom VI p 407) has conceived a strange idea that Alavivus was the same person as Ulpilas the Gothic bishop and that Ulpilas the grandson of a Cappadocian captive became a temporal prince of the Goths

62 Ammianus (xxvi 3) and Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis c 24) describe the subversion of the Gothic empire by the Huns

63 The chronology of Ammianus is obscure and imperfect Tillemont has laboured to clear and settle the annals of Valens

64. Zosimus, l iv [c 20] p 223 Sozomen, l vi c 38 The Isaurians, each winter, infested the roads of Asia Minor, as far as the neighbourhood of Constantinople Basil, Epist cel apud Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 106

65 The passage of the Danube is exposed by Ammianus (xxxix 3, 4), Zosimus (l iv [c 20] p 223, 224), Eunapius in Excerpt Legat (p 19, 20 [p 49, 50, ed Bonn]), and Jornandes (c 25, 26) Ammianus declares (c 5) that he means only ipsas rerum digerere summitates But he often takes a false measure of their importance, and his superfluous prolixity is disagreeably balanced by his unseasonable brevity

66 Chishull, a curious traveller, has remarked the breadth of the Danube, which he passed to the south of Bucharest, near the conflux of the Argish (p 77) He admires the beauty and spontaneous plenty of Mæsia, or Bulgaria

67 Quem qui scire velit, Libyci velis æquoribus idem

Discere quam multæ Zephyro turbentur arenæ

Ammianus has inserted in his prose these lines of Virgil (Georgic l ii 105), originally designed by the poet to express the impossibility of numbering the different sorts of vines See Plin Hist Natur l xiv

68 Eunapius and Zosimus curiously specify these articles of Gothic wealth and luxury Yet it must be presumed that they were the manufactures of the provinces, which the barbarians had acquired as the spoils of war, or as the gifts or merchandise of peace

69 Decem libras, the word siliæ must be understood Jornandes betrays the passions and prejudices of a Goth The servile Greeks, Eunapius and Zosimus, disguise the Roman oppression, and exonerate the perfidy of the barbarians Ammianus, a patriot historian, slightly and reluctantly touches on the odious subject Jerom, who wrote almost on the spot, is fair, though concise Per avartiam Maximus ducis, ad rebellionem fame coacti sunt (in Chron tom viii p 817, ed Vallars)

70 Ammianus, xxxix 4, 5

71 Vexillis de more sublati, auditusque triste sonantibus classicis Ammianus xxxix 5 These are the trunca cornua of Claudian (in Rufin ii 57), the large horns of the Uri, or wild bull—such as have been more recently used by the Swiss cantons of Uri and Unterwald (Simler de Republica Helvet l ii p 701, edit Fuselin Tigur 1734) Their military horn is finely, though perhaps casually, introduced in an original narrative of the battle of Nancy (A D 1477) "Attendant le combat le dit cor fut corné par trois fois, tant que le vent du souffleur pouvoit durer ce qui esbahit fort Monsieur de Bourgoigne, car d'ice à Morat Paroit oy" (See the Pièces Justificatives in the 4to edition of Philippe de Comines, tom. iii. p 493)

72 Jornandes de Rebus Geticis, c 26, p 648, edit Grot These splendidi panni (they are comparatively such) are undoubtedly transcribed from the larger histories of Priscus, Ablavius, or Cassiodorus

73 Cum populis suis longe ante suscepti We are ignorant of the precise date and circumstances of their transmigration

74 An imperial manufacture of shields, etc., was established at Hadrianople, and the populace were headed by the Fabricenses, or workmen (Vales ad Ammian xxxix 6)

75 Pacem sibi esse cum parietibus memorans Ammian xxxix 11

76 These mines were in the country of the Bessi, in the ridge of mountains, the Rhodope, that runs between Philippi and Philippopolis, two Macedonian cities, which derived their name and origin from the father of Alexander From the mines of Thrace he annually received the value, not the weight, of a thousand talents (£200,000)—a revenue which paid the phalanx and corrupted the orators of Greece See Diodor Siculus, tom ii l xvi [c 8] p 88, edit Wesseling Godefroy's Commentary on the Theodosian Code, tom iii p 496 Cellarius, Geograph Antiq tom i p 676, 857 D'Anville, Geographie Ancienne, tom i p 336

77 As those unhappy workmen often ran away, Valens had enacted severe laws to drag them from their hiding places Cod Theodosian, l x tit xix. leg 5, 7

78 See Ammianus xxxix 5, 6 The historian of the Gothic war loses time and space by an unseasonable recapitulation of the ancient inroads of the barbarians

79 The Itinerary of Antoninus (p 226, 227, edit Wesseling) marks the situation of this place about sixty miles north of Tomi, Ovid's exile, and the name of Salices (the willows) expresses the nature of the soil

80 This circle of waggons, the Carraago, was the usual fortification of the barbarians (Vegetius de Re Militari, l iii c 10 Valesius ad Ammian xxxix 7) The practice and the name were preserved by their descendants as late as the fifteenth century The Charroy, which surrounded the Ost, is a word familiar to the readers of Froissart, or Comines

81 Statim ut accensi malleoli [Amm xxxix 7] I have used the literal sense of real torches or beacons but I almost suspect that it is only one of those turpid metaphors, those false ornaments, that perpetually disfigure the style of Ammianus

82 Indicant nunc usque albentes ossibus campi Ammian xxxix 7 The historian might have viewed these plains either as a soldier or as a traveller But his modesty has suppressed the adventures of his own life subsequent to the Persian wars of Constantius and Julian We are ignorant of the time when he quitted the service and retired to Rome, where he appears to have composed his History of his Own Times.

85 Ammian xxxi 8 p Jerom (tom. i p 26 [tom. i p 342 ed Vallars]) enumerates the nations and marks a calamitous period of twenty years This epistle to Heliodorus was composed in the year 397 (Tillemont Mém. Eccles. tom. xii p 645)

86 The field of battle Argentaria or Argentoraria is accurately fixed by M. d'Anville (Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule p 96-99) at twenty three Gallic leagues or thirty four and a half Roman miles to the south of Strasburg From its ruins the adjacent town of Colmar has arisen

87 The full and impartial narrative of Ammianus (xxxii 10) may derive some additional light from the Epitome of Victor the Chronicle of Jerom and the History of Orosius (l. vii c 33 p 552 edit Havercamp)

I. Dissertat. xxi. p 354.

90. Ammian. xxxii 11 Zosimus l. iv [c 23] p 228-230. The latter expatiates on the desultory exploits of Sebastian and despatches in a few lines the important battle of Hadrianople According to the ecclesiastical critics who hate Sebastian the praise of Zosimus is disgrace (Tillemont Hist. des Empereurs tom. v p 121) His prejudice and ignorance undoubtedly render him a very questionable judge of merit

91 Ammianus (xxxii. 12 13) almost alone describes the councils and actions which were terminated by the fatal battle of Hadrianople We might censure the vices of his style the disorder and perplexity of his narrative but we must now take leave of this impartial historian and reproach is silenced by our regret for such an irreparable loss.

92 The difference of the eight miles of Ammianus and the twelve of Idatius can only embarrass those critics (Valensius ad loc.) who suppose a great army to be a mathematical point without space or dimensions

93. Nec ulla annalibus, præter Cannensem pugnam ita ad internecionem res legitur gestamian xxxii 13 According to the grave Polybius no more than 370 horse and 3000 foot from the field of Cannæ 10 000 oners and the number of the slain amounted to 5630 horse and 70 000 foot (Polyb. l. iii [c 117] p 371 edit Casaubon in 8vo.) Livy (xvi 49) somewhat less bloody he slaughters only 2700 horse and 40 000 foot The Roman army was supposed to consist of 87 200 effective men (xvi 36)

94 We have gained some faint light from Jerom (tom. i p 26 [tom. i p 342 ed Vallars]) and in Chron. p 188 [tom. viii p 817 ed. Vallars] Victor (in Epitome) Orosius (l. vii c 33 p 554) Jornandes (c 27) Zosimus (l. iv [c 24] p 230) Socrates (l. iv c 38) Sozomen (l. vi c 40) Idatius (in Chron.) But their united evidence if weighed against Ammianus alone is light and unsubstantial

96 Valens had gained or rather purchased, the friendship of the Saracens whose voracious inroads were felt on the borders of Phœnicia Palestine and Egypt The Christian faith had been lately introduced among a people reserved in a future age to propagate another religion (Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs tom. v p 104 106 141 Mém. Eccles. tom. vii p 593)

97 Crinitus quidam nudus omnia præter pubem subraucum et lugubre strepens Ammian. xxxii 16 and Vales ad loc. I. p 72 84 87

98 The series of events may still be traced in the last pages of Ammianus (xxxii 15 16) Zosimus (l. iv [c 22] p 227 231) whom we are now reduced to cherish misplaces the sally of the Arabs before the death of Valens Eunapius (in Excerpt. Legat. p 20 [p 51 ed Bonn]) praises the fertility of Thrace Macedonia etc

99 Observe with how much indifference Cassar relates in the Commentaries of the Gallic war that he put to death the whole senate of the Veneti who had yielded to his mercy (iii 16) that he laboured to extirpate the whole nation of the Eburones (vi 43) that forty thousand persons were massacred at Bourges by the just revenge of his soldiers who spared neither age nor sex (vii 3) etc

100 Such are the accounts of the sack of Madgeburg by the ecclesiastical and the fisherman, which Mr Harte has transcribed (Hist. of Constantinus Adolphus vol. I. p 313-320) with some apprehension of violating the dignity of history

[tom. i. p. 342, ed Vallars]

102 Eunapius (in Excerpt. Legat. p. 20 [p. 50, ed. Bonn]) foolishly supposes a preternatural growth of the young Goths, that he may introduce Cadmus's armed men, who sprung from the drag-on's teeth, etc. Such was the Greek eloquence of the times

103. Ammianus evidently approves this execution, efficacia velox et salutaris, which concludes his work (xxv. 16) Zosimus, who is curious and copious (l. iv. [c. 26] p. 233-236), mistakes the date, and labours to find the reason why Julius did not consult the emperor Theodosius, who had not yet ascended the throne of the East

104. A life of Theodosius the Great was composed in the last century (Paris, 1679, in 4to, 1680, in 12mo), to inflame the mind of the young dauphin with Catholic zeal. The author, Flechier, afterwards bishop of Nîmes, was a celebrated preacher, and his history is adorned or tainted with pulpit eloquence, but he takes his learning from Baronius, and his principles from St Ambrose and St Augustin

105. The birth, character, and elevation of Theodosius, are marked in Pacatus (in Panegyri Vet.
xii. 10, 11, 12), Themistius (Orat. xiv. p. 182), Zosimus (l. iv. [c. 24] p. 231), Augustine (The City of God, v. 26), Orosius (l. vii. c. 34), Sozomen (l. vii. c. 2), Socrates (l. v. c. 2), Theodoret (l. v. c. 5), Philostorgius (l. ix. c. 17, with Godefroy,
p. 393), the Epitome of Victor, and the Chronicles of Prosper, Idatius, and Marcellinus, in the Thesaurus Temporum of Scaliger wounded veterans of Italy. The ruins still appear, about a league above Seville, but on the opposite bank of the river. See the Hispania Illustrata of Norius—a short though valuable treatise—c. xvii.

p. 64-67

108. I agree with Tillemont (Hist. des Empe-reurs, tom. v. p. 726), in suspecting the royal pedigree, which remained a secret till the promotion of Theodosius. Even after that event, the prince of Pacatus outweighs the venal evidence of Themistius, Victor, and Claudian, who connect the family of Theodosius with the blood of Trajan and Hadrian.

109. Pacatus compares, and consequently prefers the youth of Theodosius, to the military education of Alexander, Hannibal, and the second Africanus, who, like him, had served under their father (xii. 8)

110. Ammianus (xxix. 6) mentions this victory of Theodosius Junior Dux Messie, primâ etiam tunc laudatâ juvenis, princeps postea perspectus-simus. The same fact is attested by Themistius and Zosimus, but Theodoret (l. v. c. 5), who adds some curious circumstances, strangely applies it to the time of the interregnum.

111. Pacatus (in Panegyri Vet. xii. 9) prefers the rustic life of Theodosius to that of Cincinnatus, the one was the effect of choice, the other of poverty

112. M. d'Anville (Geographie Ancienne, tom.
i. p. 25) has fixed the situation of Caucha, or Coca, in the old province of Galicia, where Zosimus and Idatius have placed the birth or patrimony of Theodosius

113. Let us hear Ammianus himself. Hæc, ut miles quondam at Græci, a principatu Cæsaris Nervæ exorsus, adusque Valentis intentum, provirum explicavi mensura opus veritatem professum nunquam, ut arbitror, sciens, silentio ausus corrumpere vel mendacio. Scribant reliqua poti-ores ætate, doctriisque florentes. Quos id, si li-buerit, aggressuros, procudere linguas ad majores moneo stulos Ammian. xxi. 16. The first thirteen books, a superficial epitome of two hundred and fifty-seven years, are now lost, the last eighteen, which contain no more than twenty-five years, still preserve the copious and authentic history of his own times

114. Ammianus was the last subject of Rome who composed a profane history in the Latin language. The East, in the next century, produced some rhetorical historians, Zosimus, Olympio-dorus, Malchus, Candidus, etc. See Vossius de Historicis Græcis, l. ii. c. 18, de Historicis Latinis,
l. ii. c. 10, etc.

faucon. I have verified and examined this passage, but I should never, without the aid of Tillemont (Hist. des Emp. tom. v. p. 152), have detected an historical anecdote in a strange medley of moral and mystic exhortations addressed, by the preacher of Antioch, to a young widow repose of Theodosius at Thessalonica. Zosimus, to diminish his glory, Jornandes, to favour the Goths and the ecclesiastical writers, to introduce his baptism

119. Compare Themistius (Orat. xiv. p. 181) with Zosimus (l. iv. [c. 25] p. 232), Jornandes (c. xxvii. p. 649), and the prolix Commentary of M. de Buat (Hist. des Peuples, etc., tom. vi. p. 477-552). The Chronicles of Idatius and Marcellinus allude, in general terms, to magna certamina magna militæ prælia. The two epithets are not easily reconciled

120. Zosimus (l. iv. [c. 25] p. 232) styles him a Sevthian—a name which the more recent Greeks seem to have appropriated to the Goths.

121. The reader will not be displeased to see the original words of Jornandes or the author whom he transcribed Regiam urbem ingressus est intransque En inquit cerno quod sæpe incredulus audiebam famam videlicet tantæ urbis Et huc illic oculos volvens nunc situm urbis commicatumque navium nunc mœnia clara prospectans miratur populosque diversarum gentium quasi fonte in uno = diversis partibus scaturiente undâ sic quoque militum ordinatum aspiciens Deus, inquit sine dubio est terrenus Imperator et quisquis adversus eum manum moverit ipse sui sanguinis reus existit Jornandes (c. xxviii p. 650) proceeds to mention his death and funeral.

122 Jornandes = xxviii p. 650 Even Zosimus (I iv [c. 34] p. 246) is compelled to approve the generosity of Theodosius so honourable to himself and so beneficial to the public

123 The short but authentic hints in the Fasts of Idatius (Chron Scaliger p. 52) are stained with contemporary passion The fourteenth oration of Themistius is a compliment to Peace and the consul Saturninus (A.D. 383)

124 Ἐθὼς γὰρ τὸ Σκίθων παλαιὸν ἄγνων Zosimus I iv [c. 38] p. 252

125 I am justified by reason and example in applying this Indian name to the μονὸς λαὸς of the barbarians, the single trees hollowed into the shape of a boat πληθεὶ μονοῦ λαὸν ἑμβάσαν et Zosimus I iv [c. 38] p. 253

Auri Danubium quondam tranare Gruthungi
In lintres fregere nemus ter mille ruebant
Per fluvium plenæ cuneis immanibus alni
Claudian in iv Cons. Hon. 623

126 Zosimus I iv [c. 38] p. 252-253 He too frequently betrays his poverty of judgment by disgracing the most serious narratives with trifling and incredible circumstances

127 ———— Odothæ Regis op ma

Retulit Ver. 632

The opima were the spoils which a Roman general could only win from the king or general of the enemy whom he had slain with his own hands and no more than three such examples are celebrated in the victorious ages of Rome

128 See Themistius Orat. xvi p. 211 Claudian (in Eutrop. l. ii. 152) mentions the Phrygian colony —

——— Ostrogothis colitur mustusque Gruthungis Phryx ager ———

and then proceeds to name the rivers of Lydia the Pactolus and Hermus

129 Compare Jornandes (c. 21-28) who marks the conditio and number of the Gothic Fœderati with Zosimus (I iv p. 258) who mentions their golden collars and Pacatus (in Panegyric Vet. xii. 37) who applauds, with false or foolish joy their bravery and discipline.

130 Amator pacis generisque Gothorum is the praise bestowed by the Gothic historian (c. xxi.) who represents his nation as innocent, peaceable men slow to anger and patient of injuries. According to Livy the Romans conquered the world in their own defence.

131 Besides the partial invectives of Zosimus (always discontented with the Christian empire) see the grave representations which Synesius addresses to the emperor Arcadius (de Regno, p. 25-26 edit. Petav. [Paris, 1612]) The philosopher bishop of Cyrene was near enough to judge and he was sufficiently removed from the temptation of fear or flattery

132 Themistius (Orat. xvi p. 211-212) composes an elaborate and rational apology which is not however exempt from the puerilities of Greek rhetoric Orpheus could only charm the wild beasts of Thrace but Theodosius enchanted the men and women whose predecessors in the same country had torn Orpheus in pieces etc.

133 Constantinople was deprived, half a day of the public allowance of bread to expiate the murder of a Gothic soldier καὶ οὐ πῶς τὸ Σκίθων was the guilt of the people Libanius, Orat. xii. p. 394 edit. Morel

134 Zosimus I iv [c. 48] p. 267-271 He tells a long and ridiculous story of the adventurous prince who roved the country with only five horsemen of a spy whom they detected whelped, and killed in an old woman's cottage etc.

135 Compare Eunapius (in Excerpt. Leont. p. 21-22 [p. 33-34 ed. Bonn]) with Zosimus (I iv [c. 56] p. 279) The difference of circumstances and names must undoubtedly be applied to the same story Fravitta, or Travitta was afterwards consul (A.D. 401) and still continued his faithful service to the eldest son of Theodosius (Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs tom. v. p. 467)

136 Les Goths ravagèrent tout depuis le Danube jusqu'au Bosphore exterminèrent Valens et son armée et ne repassèrent le Danube qu'après abandonner l'affreuse solitude qu'ils avoient faite (Œuvres de Montesquieu tom. iii. p. 419 Considérations sur les Causes de la Grandeur et de la Décadence des Romains = xvii) The president Montesquieu seems ignorant that the Goths after the defeat of Valens never abandoned the Roman territory It is now thirty years, as Claud. au (de Bello Getico 166 etc. A.D. 404)

Ex quo jam patrios gens hæc oblita Troæque
Atque Istrum transacta semel vestigia sunt
Threicio funesta solo ———

The error is inexcusable since it disguises the principal and immediate cause of the fall of the Western empire of Rome.

Chapter XXVII

1 Valentinian was less attentive to the religion of his son, since he intrusted the education of Gratian to Ausonius, a professed Pagan (Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom xv p 125-138) The poetical fame of Ausonius condemns the taste of his age

2 Ausonius was successively promoted to the Pretorian præfecture of Italy (A D 377) and of Gaul (A b 378), and was at length invested with the consulship (A D 379) He expressed his gratitude in a servile and insipid piece of flattery (Actio Gratiarum, p 699-736 [ed Toll Amst 1671]), which has survived more worthy productions

3 Disputare de principali judicio non oportet Sacrilegi enim instar est dubitare, an is dignus sit, quem elegerit imperator Codex Justinian I iv tit. xix leg 2 This convenient law was revived and promulgated, after the death of Gratian, by the feeble court of Milan

4 Ambrose composed, for his instruction, a theological treatise on the faith of the Trinity and Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 158, 159) ascribes to the archbishop the merit of Gratian's intolerant laws

5 Qui divinæ legis sanctitatem [aut] nesciendo omittunt, aut negligendo violent, et offendunt, sacrilegium committunt Codex Justinian I iv tit. xxix. leg 1 Theodosius indeed may claim his share in the merit of this comprehensive law

6 Ammianus (xxvi 10) and the younger Victor [Epit c 47] acknowledge the virtues of Gratian, and accuse, or rather lament, his degenerate taste The odious parallel of Commodus is saved by 'licet incruentus,' and perhaps Philostorgius (I x c. 10 [5], and Godefroy, p 412) had guarded, with some similar reserve, the comparison of Nero

7 Zosimus (I iv [c. 35] p 247) and the younger Victor ascribe the revolution to the favour of the Alani and the discontent of the Roman troops Dum exercitum negligenter, et paucos ex Alanis quos ingenti auro ad se transtulerit, anteferebat veteri ac Romano militi [Epit c 47]

8 Britannia fertilis provincia tyrannorum, a memorable expression used by Jerom in the Pelagian controversy, and variously tortured in the disputes of our national antiquaries The revolutions of the last age appeared to justify the image of the sublime Bossuet, "cette île, plus orageuse que les mers qui l'environnent"

9. Zosimus says of the British soldiers, ὡς ἄλλοις ἐπὶ τὸν Αἰθιοπίαν καὶ τοὺς Ἰνδοὺς [I c.]

10. Helena the daughter of Ludda, Her chapel may still be seen at Caersegont, now Caer naryon (Carte's Hist of England, vol 1 p 168, from Rowland's Mona Antiqua) The prudent reader may not perhaps be satisfied with such Welch evidence.

11 Camden (vol 1 introduct p c1) appoints him governor of Britain, and the father of our antiquities is followed, as usual, by his blind progeny Pacatus and Zosimus had taken some pains to prevent this error or fable, and I shall protect myself by their decisive testimonies Regali habitū exulem suum, illi exules orbis induerunt (in Panegy. Vet xii 23), and the Greek historian still less equivocally, αὐτὸς (Maximus) δὲ οὐδὲ εἰς ἀρχὴν ἐντιμον ἐτύχε προελθὼν (I iv [c 35] p 248)

12 Sulpicius Severus, Dialog ii 7 Orosius, I vii c 34, p 556 They both acknowledge (Sulpicius had been his subject) his innocence and merit It is singular enough that Maximus should be less favourably treated by Zosimus, the partial adversary of his rival

13 Archbishop Usher (Antiquitat Britan Eccles p 107, 108) has diligently collected the legends of the island and the continent The whole emigration consisted of 30,000 soldiers and 100,000 plebeians, who settled in Bretagne Their destined brides, St Ursula with 11,000 noble and 60,000 plebeian virgins, mistook their way, landed at Cologne, and were all most cruelly murdered by the Huns But the plebeian sisters have been defrauded of their equal honours, and what is still harder, John Trithemius presumes to mention the children of these British virgins

14 Zosimus (I iv [c 35] p 248, 249) has transported the death of Gratian from Lugdunum in Gaul (Lions) to Singidunum in Mæsia Some hints may be extracted from the Chronicles, some lies may be detected in Sozomen (I vii c 13) and Socrates (I v c 11) Ambrose is our most authentic evidence (tom 1 Enarrat in Psalm lxi p 961, tom II Epist xxiv p 888, etc., and de Obitu Valentinian Consolat No 28, p 1182)

15 Pacatus (xii 28) celebrates his fidelity, while his treachery is marked in Prosper's Chronicle as the cause of the ruin of Gratian Ambrose, who has occasion to exculpate himself, only condemns the death of Valio, a faithful servant of Gratian (tom II Epist xxiv p 891, edit Benedict)

16 He protested, nullum ex adversariis nisi in acie occubuisse. Sulp Severus in Vit B Martin c 23 The orator of Theodosius bestows a reluctant, and therefore weighty, praise on his clemency Si cui ille, pro ceteris, sceleribus, suit minus excusatus fuisse videtur (Panegy. Vet xii 28)

17 Ambrose mentions the laws of Gratian quas non abro, vit hostis (tom II Epist xii p 827)

18 Zosimus, I iv [c. 37] p 251, 252 We may disclaim his odious suspicions, but we cannot reject the treaty of peace which the friends of Theodosius have absolutely forgotten or slightly mentioned

19 Their oracle, the archbishop of Milan, assigns to his pupil Gratian an high and respectable place in heaven (tom ii de Obiit Val Consol p 1193)

20 For the baptism of Theodosius see Sozomen (l vii c. 4) Socrates (l v c. 6) and Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom v p 728)

21 Ascolius or Acholius was honoured by the friendship and the praises of Ambrose who styles him murus fidei atque sanctitatis (tom ii Epist xv p 820) and afterwards celebrates his speed and diligence in running to Constantinople Italy etc (Epist xvi p 822)—a virtue which does not appertain either to a wall or a bishop

22 Codex Theodos l xvi tit 1 leg 2 with Godefroy's Commentary tom vi p 5-9 Such an edict deserved the warmest praises of Baronius auream sanctionem edictum pium et salutare — sic iustit ad astra

23 Sozomen l vii c. 6 Theodoret l v c. 16 Tillemont is displeased (Mém Ecclési tom vi p 627 628) with the terms of rustic bishop obscure city Yet I must take leave to think that both Amphilocheus and Iconium were objects of inconsiderable magnitude in the Roman empire

24 Sozomen l vii c. 5 Socrates l v c. 7 Marcellin in Chron The account of forty years must be dated from the election or intrusion of Eusebius who wisely exchanged the bishopric of Nicomedia for the throne of Constantinople

25 See Jortin's Remarks on Ecclesiastical History vol. iv p 71 The thirty third Oration of Gregory Nazianzen affords indeed some similar ideas even some still more ridiculous but I have not yet found the words of this remarkable passage, which I allege on the faith of a correct and liberal scholar

26 See the thirty second Oration of Gregory Nazianzen and the account of his own life which he has composed in 1800 iambs Yet every physician is prone to exaggerate the inveterate nature of the disease which he has cured

27 I confess myself deeply indebted to the two Lives of Gregory Nazianzen composed with very different views by Tillemont (Mém Ecclési tom ix p 305-360 692-731) and Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Universelle tom xviii p 1-128)

28 Unless Gregory Nazianzen mistook thirty years in his own age he was born as well as his friend Basil about the year 329. The preposterous chronology of Suidas has been graciously received because it removes the scandal of Gregory's father a saint likewise begetting children after he became a bishop (Tillemont Mém Ecclési tom ix p 693-697)

29 Gregory's Poem on his own Life contains some beautiful lines (tom ii p 8 [ed Paris 1609]) which burst from the heart and speak the pangs of injured and lost friendship —

τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον
ὁμοῦ τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον
ὡς τὸ αὐτὸν
ὡς τὸ αὐτὸν
ὡς τὸ αὐτὸν
ὡς τὸ αὐτὸν
ὡς τὸ αὐτὸν
ὡς τὸ αὐτὸν

In the Midsummer Night's Dream Helena addresses the same pathetic complaint to her friend Hermia —

Is all the counsel that we two have shared,

The sisters' vows etc.

Shakspeare had never read the poems of Gregory Nazianzen he was ignorant of the Greek language but his mother tongue the language of Nature is the same in Cappadocia and in Britain

30 This unfavourable portrait of Saisima drawn by Gregory Nazianzen (tom ii de Vita sua p 7 8) Its precise situation forty nine miles from Archelaus and thirty two from Tyana, is fixed in the Itinerary of Antoninus (p 144, ed Wesseling)

31 The name of Nazianzus has been imported by Gregory but his native town under the Greek or Roman title of Diocesarea (Tillemont, Mém Ecclési tom ix p 692) is mentioned by Pliny (vi 3) Ptolemy and Hierocles (Itinerary Wesseling p 709) It appears to have been situated on the edge of Isauria

32 See Ducange Constant Christiana, l iv p 141 142 The βίβλος of Sozomen (l vii c. 5) is interpreted to mean the Virgin Mary

33 Tillemont (Mém Ecclési tom ix p 432 etc.) diligently collects enlarges and explains the oratorical and poetical hints of Gregory himself

34 He pronounced an oration (tom i Orat. xviii p 409) in his praise but after their quarrel the name of Maximus was changed into that of Heron (see Jerom tom i in Catalog Script Ecclési p 301 [tom ii p 930 ed Vallars]) I touch slightly on these obscure and personal squabbles

35 Under the modest emblem of a dream, Gregory (tom ii Carmen iv p 78) describes his own success with some human complacency yet it should seem from his familiar conversation with his auditor St. Jerom (tom i Epist. ad Nepotian. p 14 [tom i p 261 ed Vallars]) that the preacher understood the true value of popular applause

36 Lacrimae auditorum laudes tuas int. is the lively and judicious advice of St. Jerom (loc cit.)

37 Socrates (l v c. 7) and Sozomen (l vii c. 3) relate the evangelical words and actions of Demophilus without a word of approbation. He considered says Socrates that it is difficult to resist the powerful but it was easy and would have been profitable to submit 38 See Gregory Nazianzen tom ii de Vita sua p 21 22 for the sake of posterity the bishop of Constantinople records a stupendous prodigy In the month of November it was a cloudy morning but the sun broke forth when the procession entered the church.

39 Of the three ecclesiastical historians, Theodoret alone (l v c. 2) has mentioned this important commission of Sapor which Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom v p 728) judiciously removes from the reign of Gratian to that of Theodosius.

40 I do not reckon Philostorgius, though he mentions (l. ix. c. 19) the expulsion of Damophilus. The Eunomian historian has been carefully strained through an orthodox sieve.

41 Le Clerc has given a curious extract (Bibliothèque Universelle, tom xviii p. 91-105) of the theological sermons which Gregory Nazianzen pronounced at Constantinople against the Arians, Eunomians, Macedonians, etc. He tells the Macedonians, who deified the Father and the Son, without the Holy Ghost, that they might as well be styled Tritheists as Dithiests. Gregory himself was almost a Tritheist, and his monarchy of heaven resembles a well regulated aristocracy.

42 The first general council of Constantinople now triumphs in the Vatican, but the popes had long hesitated, and their hesitation perplexes and almost staggers the humble Tillemont (Mém. Ecclés. tom ix p. 499, 500).

43 Before the death of Meletius, six or eight of his most popular ecclesiastics, among whom was Flavian, had abjured, for the sake of peace, the bishopric of Antioch (Sozomen, l. vii. c. 3, 11; Socrates, l. v. c. 5). Tillemont thinks it his duty to disbelieve the story, but he owns that there are many circumstances in the life of Flavian which seem inconsistent with the praises of Chrysostom and the character of a saint (Mém. Ecclés. tom x. p. 541).

44 Consult Gregory Nazianzen, de vitâ suâ, tom ii p. 25-28. His general and particular opinion of the clergy and their assemblies may be seen in verse and prose (tom i. Orat. i p. 33, Epist. lv p. 814, tom ii, Carmen x p. 81). Such passages are faintly marked by Tillemont, and fairly produced by Le Clerc.

45 See Gregory, tom ii de Vitâ suâ, p. 28-31. The fourteenth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-second Orations were pronounced in the several stages of this business. The peroration of the last (tom i p. 528), in which he takes a solemn leave of men and angels, the city and the emperor, the East and the West, etc., is pathetic, and almost sublime.

46 The whimsical ordination of Nectarius is attested by Sozomen (l. vii. c. 8), but Tillemont observes (Mém. Ecclés. tom ix p. 719), Après tout, ce narré de Sozomène est si honteux pour tous ceux qu'il y mêle, et surtout pour Théodose, qu'il vaut mieux travailler à le détruire qu'à le soutenir an admirable canon of criticism!

47 I can only be understood to mean that such was his natural temper when it was not hardened or inflamed by religious zeal. From his retirement he exhorts Nectarius to prosecute the heretics of Constantinople.

48 See the Theodosian Code, l. xvi. tit. v. leg. 6-23, with Godefroy's commentary on each law, and his general summary, or Paratitlon, tom vi p. 104-110.

49 They always kept their Easter, like the Jewish Passover, on the fourteenth day of the first moon after the vernal equinox and thus perti-naciously opposed the Roman church and Nicene synod, which had fixed Easter to a Sunday. Bingham's Antiquities, l. xx. c. 5, vol. ii p. 309, fol. edit.

50 Sozomen, l. vii. c. 12.

51 See the Sacred History of Sulpicius Severus (l. ii p. 437-452, edit. Lugd. Bat. 1647), a correct and original writer. Dr Lardner (Credibility, etc., part ii vol. ix p. 256-350) has laboured this article with pure learning, good sense, and moderation. Tillemont (Mém. Ecclés. tom viii p. 491-527) has raked together all the dirt of the fathers—an useful scavenger!

52 Sulpicius Severus mentions the arch heretic with esteem and pity. Felix profecto, si non pravo studio corrupisset optimum ingenium, prorsus multa in eo animi et corporis bona cerneret (Hist. Sacra, l. ii p. 439). Even Jerom (tom i in Script. Eccles. p. 302 [tom ii p. 934, ed. Vallars]) speaks with temper of Priscillian and Latronian.

53 The bishopric (in Old Castile) is now worth 20,000 ducats a year (Busching's Geography, vol. ii p. 308), and is therefore much less likely to produce the author of a new heresy.

54 Exprobrabatur mulieri videtur nimia religio, et diligentius culta divinitas (Pacat in Panegy. Vet. xii. 29). Such was the idea of a humane though ignorant polytheist.

55 One of them was sent in Syllinam insulam quæ ultra Britanniam est. What must have been the ancient condition of the rocks of Scilly (Camden's Britannia, vol. ii p. 1519)?

56 The scandalous calumnies of Augustin, pope Leo, etc., which Tillemont swallows like a child, and Lardner refutes like a man, may suggest some candid suspicions in favour of the older Gnostics.

57 Ambrose tom ii Epist. xxiv p. 891.

58 In the Sacred History, and the Life of St Martin, Sulpicius Severus uses some caution but he declares himself more freely in the Dialogues (iii. 15). Martin was reproved, however, by his own conscience and by an angel nor could he afterwards perform miracles with so much ease.

59 The catholic presbyter (Sulp. Sever. l. ii p. 448), and the Pagan orator (Pacat in Panegy. Vet. xii. 29), reprobate with equal indignation the character and conduct of Ithacius.

60 The Life of St Martin, and the Dialogues concerning his miracles, contain facts adapted to the grossest barbarism in a style not unworthy of the Augustan age. So natural is the alliance between good taste and good sense, that I am always astonished by this contrast.

61 The short and superficial Life of St Ambrose by his deacon Paulinus (Appendix ad edit. Benedict p. i-cv) has the merit of original evidence. Tillemont (Mém. Ecclés. tom x. p. 78-306) and the Benedictine editors (p. xxvi-lxxx) have laboured with their usual diligence.

62 Ambrose himself (tom ii Epist. xxiv p. 888-891) gives the emperor a very spirited account of his own embassy.

63 His own representation of his principles and conduct (tom ii. Epist. xx. xxi. xxi. p. 832-889) is one of the curious monuments of ecclesiastical antiquity. It contains 10 letters to his sister Marcellina with a petition to Valentinian and the sermon de Basilicis non tradendis.

64. Retz had a similar message from the queen to request that he would appease the tumult of Paris. It was no longer in his power etc. A quoi j'ajoutai tout ce que vous pouvez vous imaginer de respect de douleur de regret et de soumission etc. (Mémoires tom i p. 140). Certainly I do not compare either the causes or the men yet the coadjutor himself had some idea (p. 84) of imitating St. Ambrose.

65. Sozomen alone (l. vii. c. 13) throws this luminous fact into a dark and perplexed narrative.

66. Excubabat pia plebs in ecclesiâ mori parata cum episcopo suo. Nos adhuc frigidi excitabamur tamen civitate attonitâ atque turbatâ Augustine Confessions ix. 13.

67. Tillemont Mém. Ecclési. tom ii. p. 840. Many churches in Italy Gaul etc. were dedicated to these unknown martyrs, of whom St. Ger vase seems to have been more fortunate than his companion.

68. Invenimus muræ magnitudinis viros duos ut prisca ætas ferebat tom ii. Epist. xxi. p. 875. The size of these skeletons was fortunately or suitably suited to the popular prejudice of the gradual decrease of the human stature, which has prevailed in every age since the time of Homer.

Grandiaque effossis mirabatur ossa sepulchris.

69. Ambros tom ii. Epist. xxi. p. 875. Augustine Confessions, ix. 16. The City of God l. xxi. c. 8. Paulin in Vita St. Ambros. c. 14 in Append. Bened. et p. 4. The blind man's name was Severus, he touched the holy garment, recovered his sight and devoted the rest of his life (at least twenty five years) to the service of the church. I should recommend this miracle to our divines if it did not prove the worship of relics as well as the Nicene creed.

70. Paulin in Vita St. Ambros. c. 5 [13] in Append. Bened. et p. 5.

71. Tillemont Mém. Ecclési. tom. x. p. 100, 750. He partially allows the mediation of Theodosius and capriciously rejects that of Maximus, though it is attested by Prosper Sozomen and Theodoret.

72. The modest censure of Sulpicius (Dialog. iii. 13 [p. 3. 6]) inflicts a much deeper wound than the feeble declamation of Pacatus (xii. 25, 26).

73. Esto tutor ad erum hominem, pacis involuero (bellum) tegementum was the wise caution of Ambrose (tom. ii. p. 891) after his return from his second embassy.

74. Baronius (a. d. 38, No. 63) applies to this season of public distress some of the penitential sermons of the archbishop.

75. The flight of Valentinian and the love of Theodosius for his sister are related by Zosimus (l. iv. c. 43) p. 263, 264. Tillemont produces some weak and ambiguous evidence to antedate the second marriage of Theodosius (Hist. des Empereurs tom. v. p. 740) and consequently in refuting the counts of Zosime qui seroient trop contraires à la pitié de Theodose.

76. See Godefroy's Chronology of the Laws Cod Theodos tom. i. p. cxx.

77. Besides the hints which may be from chronicles and ecclesiastical history Zosimus (l. iv. c. 40, seq. p. 259-267) Orosius (l. vii. c. 35) and Pacatus (in Panegyric Vet. xii. 30-47) supply the loose and scanty materials of this civil war. Ambrose (tom. ii. Epist. xl. p. 95-953) darkly alludes to the well known events of a marine surprised an action at Petovio a Sicilian, perhaps a naval victory etc. Ausonius (p. 235, edit. Toll.) applauds the peculiar merit and good fortune of Aquileia.

78. Quam promptum laudare principem, iam tutum siluisse de principe (Pacatus in Panegyric Vet. xii. 2). Latinus Pacatus Drepanius, a native of Gaul pronounced this oration at Rome (a. d. 388). He was afterwards proconsul of Africa and his friend Ausonius praises him as a poet second only to Virgil. See Tillemont Hist. des Empereurs, tom. v. p. 303.

79. See the fair portrait of Theodosius by the younger Victor the strokes are distinct and the colours are mixed. The praise of Pacatus is too vague and Claudian always seems afraid of exalting the father above the son.

80. Ambros tom. ii. Epist. xl. p. 953. Pacatus, from the want of skill or of courage omits the glorious circumstance.

81. Pacatus in Panegyric Vet. xii. 20.

82. Zosimus l. iv. c. 40 p. 271, 27. His partial evidence is marked by an air of candour and truth. He observes these vicissitudes of sloth and activity not as a vice but as a singularity in the character of Theodosius.

83. This choleric temper is acknowledged and excused by Victor [Epist. c. 48]. Sed habes (says Ambrose in decent and manly language to his sovereign) nature impetum quem si quis lenire velit cito vertes ad misericordiam. si quis stimulet, in magis exarscit ut eum revocare via possis (tom. ii. Epist. li. p. 998). Theodosius (Claudian in Cons. Hon. 266 etc.) exhorts his son to moderate his anger.

84. The Christians and Pagans agreed in believing that the sedition of Antioch was excited by the demons. A gigantic woman (says Sozomen, l. vii. c. 23) paraded the streets with a scourge in her hand. An old man says Labanius (Orat. xii. p. 397) transformed himself into a youth, then a boy etc.

85. Zosimus in his short and disingenuous account (l. i. c. 41) p. 258, 259) is certainly mistaken in sending Labanius himself to Constantinople. His own orations fix him at Antioch.

86. Libanius (Orat. l. p. 6, edit. Venet.) declares that under such a reign the fear of a man-

etc. was groundless and absurd, especially in the emperor's absence for his presence, according to the eloquent slave, might have given a sanction to the most bloody acts

87 Laodicea, on the sea coast, sixty five miles from Antioch (see Norris, Epoch Syro Maced Dissert iii p 230) The Antiochians were offended that the dependent city of Seleucia should presume to intercede for them

88 As the days of the tumult depend on the most noble festival of Easter, they can only be determined by the previous determination of the year The year 387 has been preferred, after a laborious inquiry, by Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom v p 741-744) and Montfaucon (Chrysostom, tom viii p 105-110)

89 Chrysostom opposes their courage, which was not attended with much risk, to the cowardly flight of the Cynics

90 The sedition of Antioch is represented in a lively and almost dramatic manner by two orators who had their respective shares of interest and merit See Libanius (Orat vii xv [xii xiii] p 389-420, edit Morel Orat i p 1-14 Venet 1754) and the twenty orations of St John Chrysostom, de Statu (tom ii p 1-225, edit Montfaucon) I do not pretend to much personal acquaintance with Chrysostom but Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 263-283) and Hermant (Vie de St Chrysostome, tom i p 137-224) had read him with pious curiosity and diligence

91 The original evidence of Ambrose (tom ii Epist li p 998), Augustine (The City of God, i 26), and Paulinus (in Vit Ambros c 24) is delivered in vague expressions of horror and pity It is illustrated by the subsequent and unequal testimonies of Sozomen (i vii c 25), Theodoret (i v c 17), Theophanes (Chronograph p 62 [tom i p 113 ed Bonn]), Cedrenus (p 317 [tom i p 556 ed Bonn]), and Zonaras (tom ii i viii [c 18] p 34) Zosimus alone, the partial enemy of Theodosius most unaccountably passes over in silence the worst of his actions

92 See the whole transaction in Ambrose (tom ii Epist xl xli p 946-956) and his biographer Paulinus (c. 23) Bayle and Barbeyrac (Morales de Péres, c xvii p 325, etc.) have justly condemned the archbishop

93 His sermon is a strange allegory of Jeremiah's rod of an almond tree, of the woman who washed and anointed the feet of Christ But the peroration is direct and personal

94 Hodie, Episcopo de me proposuisti Ambrose modestly confessed it but he sternly reprimanded Timotheus general of the horse and foot who had presumed to say that the monks of Callicum deserved punishment

95 Yet, five years afterwards when Theodosius was absent from his spiritual guide he tolerated the Jews, and condemned the destruction of their synagogues Cod Theodos i xvi iii viii leg 9 with Godefroy's Commentary tom vi p 225.

96 Ambros tom ii Epist li p 997-1001 His epistle is a miserable rhapsody on a noble subject Ambrose could act better than he could write. His compositions are destitute of taste or genius with out the spirit of Tertullian, the copious elegance of Lactantius, the lively wit of Jerom, or the grave energy of Augustin

97 According to the discipline of St Basil (Canon lvi), the voluntary homicide was four years a mourner sive an hearer, scilicet in a prostrate state and four in a standing posture I have the original (Beveridge, Pandeet tom ii p 47-151) and a translation (Chardon, Hist des Sacramens tom ii p 219-277) of the Canonical Epistles of St Basil

98 The penance of Theodosius is authenticated by Ambrose (tom ii de Obiit Theodos c 34 p 1207), Augustine (The City of God, i 26), and Paulinus (in Vit Ambros c 24) Socrates is ignorant Sozomen (i vii c 25) concise and the copious narrative of Theodoret (i v c. 18) must be used with precaution

99 Codex Theodos i ix tit xi leg 13 The date and circumstances of this law are perplexed with difficulties but I feel myself inclined to favour the honest efforts of Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom v p 721) and Pagi (Critica tom i p 578)

101 Τοῦτο νεπὶ τοῦ εὐεργέτας καθ' ἑαυτὸν ἰδοῦναι εἶναι, is the niggard praise of Zosimus himself (i ii [c. 48] p 267) Augustin says with some happiness of expression, Valentinianum misericordissimā veneratione restituit

102 Sozomen, i vii c 14. His chronology is very irregular

103 See Ambrose (tom ii de Obiit Valentinian c 15 etc., p 1178 c 36 etc. p 1184) When the young emperor gave an entertainment he fasted himself he refused to see an handsome actress etc Since he ordered his wild beasts to be killed it is ungenerous in Philostorgius (i xi c 1) to reproach him with the love of that amusement

104 Zosimus (i ii [c. 53] p 275) praises the enemy of Theodosius But he is detected by Socrates (i v c 25) and Orosius (i vii c 35)

105 Gregory of Tours (i ii c 9 p 165 in the second volume of the Historians of France) has preserved a curious fragment of Sulpicius Alexander an historian far more valuable than himself

106 Godefroy (Dissert ad Philostorg p 429-474) has diligently collected all the circumstances of the death of Valentinian II The variations and the ignorance of contemporary writers prove that it was secret

107 De Obiit Valentinian tom ii p 1173-1196 He is forced to speak a discreet and obscure language yet he is much bolder than any lawyer, or perhaps any other ecclesiastic, would have dared to be

113 The Life of John of Lycopolis is described by his two friends Rufinus (I ii c 1 p 449) and Palladius (Hist Lausiac c. 43 p 738) in Roswyde's great Collection of the Vitæ Patrum. Tillemont (Mém Ecclési tom x. p 718 720) has settled the chronology

114 Sozomen I vii c 22 Claudian (in Eutrop l. 1. 312) mentions the eunuch's journey but he most contemptuously derives the Egyptian dreams and the oracles of the Nile

Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti

These famous lines of Claudian (in iii Cons Hon or 93 A D 396) are alleged by his contemporaries Augustus and Orosius who suppress the Pagan deity of /Eolus and add some circumstances from the information of eye witnesses Within four months after the victory it was compared by Ambrose to the miraculous victories of Moses and Joshua

121 The events of this civil war are gathered from Ambrose (tom ii. Epist lxxi p 1022) Palladius (in Vit Ambros c 26-34) Augustine (The City of God v 26) Orosius (I vii c 35) Sozomen (I vii c 24) Theodoret (I v c 24) Zosimus (I iv c 58) p 281 282) Claudian (in iii Cons Hon 63-105 in iv Cons Hon 70-117) and the Chronicles published by Scaliger

122 This disease ascribed by Socrates (L v c 26) to the fatigues of war ■ represented by Philostorgius (L vi c 2) as the effect of sloth and intemperance for which Photius calls him an impudent liar (Godefroy Dissert p 438)

123 Zosimus supposes that the boy Honorius accompanied his father (I iv c 58) p 280) Yet the quanto flagrant pectora voto is all that flattery would allow to a contemporary poet who clearly describes the emperor's refusal and the journey of Honorius after the victory (Claudian iii. Cons 78-125)

Chapter XXVIII

1 St Ambrose (tom ii de Obiit Theodos p 1208 [ed Bened ]) expressly praises and recommends the zeal of Josiah in the destruction of idolatry The language of Julius Firmicus Maternus on the same subject (de Errore Profan Relig p 467, edit Gronov [Rotterdam 1743]) is piously inhuman Nec filio iubet (the Mosaic Law) parci, nec fratri, et per amatam conjugem gladium vindicem ducit, etc

2 Bayle (tom ii p 406, in his Commentaire Philosophique) justifies and limits these intolerant laws by the temporal reign of Jehovah over the Jews The attempt is laudable

3 See the outlines of the Roman hierarchy in Cicero (de Legibus, ii 7, 8), Livy (i 20), Dionysius Halicarnassensis (i ii [c 63, sqq] p 119-129 edit Hudson), Beaufort (République Romaine, tom i p 1-90), and Moyle (vol i p 10-55) The last is the work of an English whig, as well as of a Roman antiquary

4 These mystic, and perhaps imaginary, symbols have given birth to various fables and conjectures It seems probable that the Palladium was a small statue (three cubits and a half high) of Minerva, with a lance and distaff, that it was usually inclosed in a seria, or barrel, and that a similar barrel was placed by its side to disconcert curiosity or sacrilege See Mezeriac (Comment sur les Epîtres d'Ovide, tom i p 60-66) and Lipsius (tom iii p 610, de Vestâ, etc, n 10)

5 Cicero frankly (ad Atticum, i ii Epist 5) or indirectly (ad Familiar i xv Epist 4) confesses that the Augurate is the supreme object of his wishes Pliny is proud to tread in the footsteps of Cicero (i ii Epist 8), and the chain of tradition might be continued from history and marbles

6 Zosimus, i iv [c 36] p 249, 250 I have suppressed the foolish pun about Pontifex and Maximus

7 This statue was transported from Tarentum to Rome, placed in the Curia Julia by Cæsar, and decorated by Augustus with the spoils of Egypt

8 Prudentius (i ii [in Symm] in initio) has drawn a very awkward portrait of Victory, but the curious reader will obtain more satisfaction from Montfaucon's Antiquities (tom i p 341)

9 See Suetonius (in August c 35) and the Exordium of Pliny's Panegyric

10 These facts are mutually allowed by the two advocates Symmachus and Ambrose

11 The Notitia Urbis, more recent than Constantine, does not find one Christian church worthy to be named among the edifices of the city Ambrose (tom ii Epist xvii p 825) deplors the public scandals of Rome which continually offended the eyes, the ears and the nostrils of the faithful

12 Ambrose repeatedly affirms in contradiction to common sense (Moyle's Works, vol ii p 147), that the Christians had a majority in the senate

13 The first (A D 382) to Gratian, who refused them audience The second (A D 384) to Valentinian, when the field was disputed by Symmachus and Ambrose The third (A D 388) to Theodosius, and the fourth (A D 392) to Valentinian Lardner (Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 372-399) fairly represents the whole transaction

14 Symmachus, who was invested with all the civil and sacerdotal honours, represented the emperor under the two characters of Pontifex Maximus and Princeps Senatus See the proud inscription at the head of his works

15 As if any one, says Prudentius (in Symmach i 639), should dig in the mud with an instrument of gold and ivory Even saints and polemic saints, treat this adversary with respect and civility

16 See the fifty fourth Epistle of the tenth book of Symmachus [p 289, ed Paris, 1604] In the form and disposition of his ten books of Epistles he imitated the younger Pliny, whose rich and florid style he was supposed by his friends to equal or excel (Macrob Saturnal, i v c 1) But the luxury of Symmachus consists of barren leaves, without fruits, and even without flowers Few facts and few sentiments can be extracted from his verbose correspondence

17 See Ambrose (tom ii Epist xvii xviii p 825-833) The former of these epistles is a short caution, the latter is a formal reply to the petition or libel of Symmachus The same ideas are more copiously expressed in the poetry, if it may deserve that name, of Prudentius who composed his two books against Symmachus (A D 404) while that senator was still alive It is whimsical enough that Montesquieu (Considérations, etc, c xix tom iii p 487) should overlook the two professed antagonists of Symmachus and amuse himself with descanting on the more remote and indirect confutations of Orosius St Augustine and Salvian

18 See Prudentius (in Symmach i i 545 etc) The Christian agrees with the Pagan Zosimus (i iv [c 50] p 283) in placing this visit of Theodosius after the second civil war, gemini bis victor crede Tyranni (i i 410) But the time and circumstances are better suited to his first triumph

19 Prudentius after proving that the sense of the senate is declared by a legal majority, proceeds to say (600 etc.),

Adspice quàm pleno subsellis nostris Senatu
Decernant infame Jovis pulvîr, et omne
Idolum longe purgat ex urbe fugandum
Qua vocat egregiæ sententia Principis illic Libera tum pedibus, tum corde, frequentia transit

Zosimus ascribes to the conscript fathers an thenish courage which few of them are found to possess

20 Jerom specifies the pontiff Albinus who was surrounded with such a believing family of children and grandchildren as would have been sufficient to convert even Jupiter himself—an extraordinary proselyte! (tom 1 ad Lactam p 54 [Ep civil tom 1 p 671 ed Vallars])

21 Exultare Patres videas pulcherrima mundi

Lumina Concliumque senum gestire Catonum

Candidiore togâ niveum pietatis amictum Sumere et exuvias deponere pontificales

The fancy of Prudentius is warmed and elevated by victory

22 Prudentius after he has described the conversion of the senate and people asks with some truth and confidence

Et dubitamus adhuc Romam tibi Christe dicatam

In leges transisse tuas?

23 Jerom exults in the desolation of the Capitol and the other temples of Rome (tom 1 p 54, tom 11 p 95)

24 Libanius (Orat pro Templis p 10 Genev 1634, published by James Godefroy and now extremely scarce) accuses Valentinian and Valens of prohibiting sacrifices. Some partial order may have been issued by the Eastern emperor but the idea of any general law is contradicted by the silence of the Code and the evidence of ecclesiastical history

25 See his laws in the Theodosian Code I xvi tit x leg 7-11

26 Homer's sacrifices are not accompanied with any inquisition of entrails (see Isthmus Antiquitat Homer I 11 10 16 The Tuscans who produced the first Harpusia subdued both the Greeks and the Romans (Cicero de Divinatione 11 23)

27 Zosimus L iv [c 37] p 245 249. Theodoret L v c 21 Idatius in Chron Prosper Aquitan L iii c 38 apud Baronium Annal Eccles A.D 389 No 32 Libanius (pro Templis p 10) labours to prove that the commands of Theodosius were not direct and positive

28 Corl Theodos L xvi tit x leg 8 18 There is room to believe that this temple of Edessa which Theodosius wished to save for civil uses was soon afterwards a heap of ruins (Libanius pro Templis p 26 27 and Godefroy's notes p 59)

29 See this curious oration of Libanius pro Templis pronounced or rather composed about the year 390. I have consulted with advantage Dr Lardner's version and remarks (Heathen Festivities, vol iv p 135 163)

30 See the Life of Martin by Sulpicius Severus c 9-14. The saint once mistook (as Don Quixote might have done) an harmless funeral for an idolatrous procession and imprudently committed a miracle.

31 Compare Scymon (L vii c 15) with Theodoret (L v c 21) Between them they relate the crusade and death of Marcellus

32 Libanius pro Templis p 10-13 He rails at these black garbed men the Christian monks, who eat more than elephants Poor elephants! they are temperate animals

33 Prosper Aquitan L iii 11 38 apud Baronium Annal Eccles A.D 389 No 58 etc. The temple had been shut some time and the access to it was overgrown with brambles

34 Donatus Roma Antiqua et Nova L iv c 4 p 468 This consecration was performed by Boniface IV I am ignorant of the favourable circumstances which had preserved the Pantheon above two hundred years after the reign of Theodosius

35 Sophronius composed a recent and separate history (Jerom in Script Eccles tom 1 p 303) which has furnished materials to Socrates (L v 11 16) Theodoret (L v 11 22) and Rufinus (L ii c 12) Yet the last who had been at Alexandria before and after the event may deserve the credit of an original witness

36 Gerard Vossius (Opera tom v p 80 and de Idololatriâ L i c 29) strives to support the strange notion of the Fathers that the patriarch Joseph was adored in Egypt as the bull Apis and the god Serapis

37 Origo dei nondum nostris celebrata Aegyptiorum antistites sic memorant etc Tacit Hist iv 83 The Greeks who had travelled into Egypt were alike ignorant of this new deity

38 Macrobius Saturnal L i c 7 Such a living fact decisively proves his foreign extraction

39 At Rome Isis and Serapis were united in the same temple. The precedency which the queen assumed may seem to betray her unequal alliance with the stranger of Pontus But the superiority of the female sex was established in Egypt in a civil and religious institution (Diodor Sicul tom L L c [c 27] 11 31 edit Wesseling) and the same order is observed in Plutarch's Treatise of Isis and Osiris whom he identifies with Serapis

40 Ammianus (xxii 16) The Expositio totius Mundi (p 8 in Hudson's Geograph Minor tom iii) and Rufinus (L ii 11 22) celebrate the Serapeum as one of the wonders of the world

41 See Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom ix 11 397-416 The old library of the Ptolemies was totally consumed in Caesar's Alexandrian war Marc Antony gave the whole collection of Pergamus (200 000 volumes) to Cleopatra, as the foundation of the new library of Alexandria

42 Libanius (pro Templis p 21) inadvertently provokes his Christian masters by this insulting remark

43 We may choose between the date of Marcellinus (A.D 389) or that of Prosper (A.D 391) Theobald (Hist des Emp tom v p 310 756) prefers the former and Paget the latter

44 Fillemont Mém Eccl's. tom xi p 441 500. The ambiguous situation of Theophilus—

sant, as the friend of Jerom, a devil, as the enemy of Chrysostom—produces a sort of impartiality, yet, upon the whole, the balance is justly inclined against him

45 Lardner (Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 411) has alleged a beautiful passage from Suidas, or rather from Damascius, which shows the devout and virtuous Olympius, not in the light of a warrior, but of a prophet

46 Nos vidimus armaria librorum, quibus deceptis, evanida ea a nostris hominibus, nostris temporibus memorent Orosius, l vi c 15, p 421, edit Havercamp Though a bigot and a controversial writer, Orosius seems to blush

47 Lunapius, in the Lives of Antoninus and Aedius, execrates the sacrilegious rapine of Theophilus Tillemont (Mém Ecclési tom xii p 453) quotes an epistle of Isidore of Pelusium, which reproaches the primate with the idolatrous worship of gold, the auri sacra fames

48 Rufinus names the priest of Saturn who, in the character of the god, familiarly conversed with many pious ladies of quality, till he betrayed himself, in a moment of transport, when he could not disguise the tone of his voice The authentic and impartial narrative of Æschines (see Bayle, Dictionnaire Critique, SCAMANDRE), and the adventure of Mundus (Joseph Antiquitat Judaic l xviii c 3 § 4), p 877, edit Havercamp), may prove that such amorous frauds have been practised with success

49 See the images of Serapis, in Montfaucon (tom ii p 297) but the description of Macrobius (Saturnal l i c 20) is much more picturesque and satisfactory

50 Sed fortes tremuere manus, motique veneranda

Majestate loci, si robora sacra ferrent
In sua credebant redituras membra secures

(Lucan iii 419) "Is it true" (said Augustus to a veteran of Italy, at whose house he supped) "that the man who gave the first blow to the golden statue of Anaxis was instantly deprived of his eyes and of his life?"—"I was that man" (replied the clear sighted veteran), "and you now sup on one of the legs of the goddess" (Plin Hist Natur xxxiii 24)

51 The History of the Reformation affords frequent examples of the sudden change from superstition to contempt

52 Sozomen, l vii c. 20 I have supplied the measure The same standard of the inundation, and consequently of the cubit, has uniformly subsisted since the time of Herodotus See Iréret, in the Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom xvi p 344-353 Greaves's Miscellaneous Works, vol. i p 233 The Egyptian cubit is about twenty two inches of the English measure

53 Libanius (pro Templis p 15 16 17) pleads their cause with gentle and insinuating rhetoric. From the earliest age such feasts had enlivened the country and those of Bæchus (Georgic ii 380) had produced the theatre of Athens See Godefroy, ad loc., Liban., and Codex Theodos tom vi p 284 [ed Lugd 1665]

54 Honorius tolerated these rustic festivals (A D 399) "Absque ullo sacrificio, atque ullâ superstitione damnabili" But nine years afterwards he found it necessary to reiterate and enforce the same proviso (Codex Theodos l xvi tit x leg 17, 19)

55 Cod Theodos l xvi tit x leg 12 Jortin (Remarks on Eccles History, vol ii p 134) censures with becoming asperity, the style and sentiment of this intolerant law

56 Such a charge should not be lightly made, but it may surely be justified by the authority of St Augustin, who thus addresses the Donatists "Quis nostrum, quis vestrum non hndat leges ab Imperatoribus datas adversus sacrificia Paganorum? Et certe longe ibi poena severior constituta est, illius quippe impietatis capitale supplicium est" Epist xciii No 10 (tom ii p 308 ed Bened 1797), quoted by Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Choisie, tom viii p 277), who adds some judicious reflections on the intolerance of the victorious Christians

57 Orosius, l vii c 28, p 537 Augustin (Enarrat in Psal exl apud Lardner, Heathen Testimonies, vol iv p 458) insults their cowardice, "Quis eorum comprehensus est in sacrificio (cum his legibus ista prohiberentur) et non negavit?"

58 Libanius (pro Templis, p 17, 18) mentions, without censure, the occasional conformity, and it were theatrical play, of these hypocrites

59 Libanius concludes his apology (p 32) by declaring to the emperor that, unless he expressly warrants the destruction of the temples, τοὶ οὐκ οὐκ τῶν ἀρχῶν δεσπότας καὶ αὐτοὶ καὶ τῷ νόμῳ βῶν θεοορτας the proprietors will defend themselves and the laws

60 Libanius, in Vit Ambros = 26 Augustine, The City of God, l i c 26 Theodoret, l ii c 24

61 Libanius suggests the form of a persecuting edict which Theodosius might enact (pro Templis, p 31) a rash joke and a dangerous experiment Some princes would have taken his advice.

62 Denique pro meritis terrestribus requirerent

Munera, vicariculis summos impertit honores,

Dux bonus et certare sinit cum laude suorum

Nec pro implicatos per debita culmina mundi

Prudent in Symmach. l 617, etc

63 Libanius (pro Templis p 32) is proud that Theodosius should thus distinguish a man who even in his private would swear by Jupiter Yet this pretence seems to be no more than a figure of rhetoric

64. Zosimus who styles himself Count and Ex advocate of the Treasury reviles with partial and indecent bigotry the Christian princes and even the father of his sovereign His work must have been privately circulated since it escaped the invecives of the ecclesiastical historians prior to Evagrius (l iii c 40-41) who lived towards the end of the sixth century

65. Yet the Pagans of Africa complained that the times would not allow them to answer with freedom the City of God nor does St Augustin (v 26) deny the charge

66. The Moors of Spain who secretly preserved the Mahometan religion above a century under the tyranny of the Inquisition possessed the Koran with the peculiar use of the Arabic tongue See the curious and honest story of their expulsion in Geddes (Miscellanies vol i p 1-108)

67. Paganos qui supersunt quamquam jam pullos esse credamus etc Cod Theodos l xvi tit x leg 22 A.D. 423 The younger Theodosius was afterwards satisfied that his judgment had been somewhat premature

72. Jerom (tom ii p 122 [contra Vigilant c. 5 tom ii p 391 ed Vallars]) bears witness to these translations, which are neglected by the ecclesiastical historians The passion of St Andrew at Achaia, which Baronius (Annal Eccles A.D. 60 No 34) wishes to believe and Tillemont is forced to reject St Andrew was adopted as the spiritual founder of Constantinople (Mém Ecclési tom i p 317-323 528-591)

73. Jerom (tom ii p 122 [l iii ed Vallars]) pompously describes the translation of Samuel which is noticed in all the chronicles of the times.

74. The Presbyter Vigilantius the protestant of his age firmly though ineffectually withstood the superstition of monks relics saints fasts etc for which Jerom compares him to the Hydra Cerberus the Centaurs etc and considers him only as the organ of the Demon (tom ii p 120-126 [tom. ii p 387-402 ed Vallars]) Whoever will peruse the controversy of St Jerom and Vigilantius and St Augustin's account of the miracles of St Stephen may speedily gain some idea of the spirit of the Fathers

75. M de Beausobre (Hist du Manichisme tom ii p 648) has applied a worldly sense in the pious observation of the clergy of Smyrna who carefully preserved the relics of St Polycarp the martyr

76. Martin of Tours (see his Life c 8 by Sulpiacius Severus) extorted this confession from the mouth of the dead man The error is allowed to be natural the discovery is supposed to be miraculous Which of the two was likely to happen most frequently?

77. Lucian composed in Greek his original narrative which has been translated by Avitus and published by Baronius (Annal Eccles A.D. 415 No 7-16) The Benedictine editors of St Augustin have given (at the end of the work De Civitate Dei) two several copies with many various readings. It is the character of falsehood to be loose and inconsistent The most incredible parts of the legend are smoothed and softened by Tillemont (Mém Ecclési tom ii p q etc)

78. A phial of St Stephen's blood was annually liquefied at Naples till he was superseded by St Januarius (Ruinar Hist Persecut Vandal p 529)

79. Augustin composed the two-and-twenty books of Civitate Dei in the space of thirteen years, A.D. 413-4 6 (Tillemont Mém Ecclési tom. xv p 608 etc) His learning is too often borrowed and his arguments are too often his own but the whole work claims the merit of a magnificent design vigorously and not unskillfully executed.

80. See Augustine The City of God xxii. 8 and the Appendix which contains two books of St Stephen's miracles by Evodius bishop of Uzalis Freculphus (apud Ragnae Hist des Juifs tom viii p 249) has preserved a Gallic or Spanish proverb Whoever pretends to have read all the miracles of St Stephen he lies

81. Burnet (de Statu Mortuorum p 35-84) collects the opinions of the Fathers as far as they assert the sleep or repose of human souls till the day of judgment He afterwards exposes (p 91 etc) the inconveniences which must arise if they possessed a more active and sensible existence

82. Vigilantius placed the souls of the prophets and martyrs either in the bosom of Abraham (in loco refrigerii) or else under the altar of God. Ne posse [de] suis tumulis et ubi voluerint adesse praesentes But Jerom (tom ii p 122 [tom ii p 392 ed Vallars]) sternly refutes this bla phemy Tu Deo leges pones? Tu apostolis vincula injicies ut usque ad diem judicii teneantur custodia nec sint cum Domino suo de quibus scriptum est sequuntur Agnum quocunque vadit Si Agnus ubique ergo et hi qui cum Agno sunt ubique esse credendi sunt Et cum diabolus et demones toto vagantur in orbe etc

83 Fleury, Discours sur l'Hist Ecclésiastique, III. p 80

84 At Minorca, the relics of St Stephen converted in eight days 540 Jews, with the help, indeed, of some unwholesome severities, such as burning the synagogue, driving the obstinate infidels to starve among the rocks, etc See the original letter of Severus bishop of Minorca (ad calcem St Augustin de Civ Dei), and the judicious remarks of Basnage (tom viii p 245-251)

85 Mr Hume (Essays, vol II p 434) observes, like a philosopher, the natural flux and reflux of polytheism and theism

86 D'Aubigne (see his own Mémoires, p 156-160) frankly offered, with the consent of the Huguenot ministers, to allow the first 400 years as the rule of faith The Cardinal du Perron haggled for forty years more, which were indiscreetly given Yet neither party would have found their account in this foolish bargain

87 The worship practised and inculcated by

Tertulian, Lactantius, Arnobius, etc, is so extremely pure and spiritual, that their declamations against the Pagan sometimes glance against the Jewish ceremonies

88 Faustus the Manichæan accuses the Catholics of idolatry Vertutis idola in martyres quos votis simulibus colitis M de Beausobre (Hist Critique du Manichéisme, tom II p 629-700), a protestant, but a philosopher, has represented, with candour and learning, the introduction of Christian idolatry in the fourth and fifth centuries

89 The resemblance of superstition, which could not be imitated, might be traced from Japan to Mexico Warburton has seized this idea, which he distorts by rendering it too general and absolute (Divine Legation, vol IV p 126, etc)

90 The imitation of Paganism is the subject of Dr Middleton's agreeable letter from Rome Warburton's animadversions obliged him to connect (vol III p 120-132) the history of the two religions, and to prove the antiquity of the Christian copy

Chapter XXIX

1 Aleto, envious of the public felicity, conceives an infernal synod, Megæra recommends her pupil Rufinus, and excites him to deeds of mischief, etc. But there is as much difference between Claudian's fury and that of Virgil, as between the characters of Turnus and Rufinus

2 It is evident (Tillemont, Hist des Emp tom V p 770), though De Marca is ashamed of his countryman, that Rufinus was born at Elusa, the metropolis of Novempopulania, now a small village of Gascony (D Anville, Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, p 289)

3 Philostorgius, I xi c 3, with Godefroy's Dissert p 440

4 A passage of Suidas is expressive of his profound dissimulation, βαρυγυμνω ἀνθρωπος καὶ κρυψόεν

5 Zosimus, I iv [c 51] p 272, 273

6 Zosimus, who describes the fall of Tatian and his son (I iv [c 52] p 273, 274), asserts their innocence, and even his testimony may outweigh the charges of their enemies (Cod Theod tom IV p 489), who accuse them of oppressing the Cumæ The connection of Tatian with the Arians, while he was præfect of Egypt (A II 373), inclines Tillemont to believe that he was guilty of every crime (Hist des Emp tom V p 360, Mém Ecclés tom V. p 589)

7 ————— Juvenum torantia colla
Ante patrum vultus strictâ cecidere securi

Ibat grandævus nato moriente superstes
Post trabes exsul In Rufin I 248
The facts of Zosimus explain the allusions of Claudian but his classic interpreters were ignorant of the fourth century The fatal cord I found, with the help of Tillemont, in a sermon of St Asterius of Amasea

8 This odious law is recited and repealed by Arcadius (A D 396), in the Theodosian Code, I ix tit xxviii leg 9 The sense, as it is explained by Claudian (in Rufin I 232) and Godefroy (tom III p 279), is perfectly clear

————— Excindere cives

Funditus, et nomen gentis delere laborat
The scruples of Pag and Tillemont can arise only from their zeal for the glory of Theodosius

9 Ammonius Rufinum propriis manibus suscepit sacro fonte mundatum See Rosweyde's Vitæ Patrum, p 947 [Heraclidis Paradisus in Append ad Vit Patr p 941 b] Sozomen (I viii c. 17) mentions the church and monastery and Tillemont (Mém Ecclés tom IX p 593) records this synod, in which St Gregory of Nyssa performed a conspicuous part

10 Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws, I xii c 12) prizes one of the laws of Theodosius, addressed to the præfect Rufinus (I ix tit IV leg unic), to discourage the prosecution of treasonable or sacrilegious words A tyrannical statute always proves the existence of tyranny but a laudable edict may only contain the specious professions or ineffectual wishes of the prince or his ministers This I am afraid, is a just though mortifying canon of criticism

————— fluctibus auri

Expleri calor ille nequit —————

Congestæ cumulantur opes orbique rapinas
Accipit una domus

This character (Claudian, in Rufin I 181-200) is confirmed by Jerom a disinterested witness (de decus invariabilis avaritiæ tom 1 ad Heliodor p 26 [Epist IV tom 1 p 342 ed Vallars]) by Zosimus (I v [c 1] p 286) and by Suidas who copied the history of Lunapius

12 ————— Cetera segnis

Ad facinus velox pentus regione remotas
Impiger ire vias

This allusion of Claudian (in Rufin 1 241) is again explained by the circumstantial narrative of Zosimus (I v [c 2] p 288 289)

13 Zosimus (I iv [c 33] p 243) praises the valour prudence and integrity of Bauto the Frank See Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom v p 771

14 Arsenius escaped from the palace of Constantinople and passed fifty five years in rigid penance in the monasteries of Egypt See Tillemont Mem Eccles tom vii p 676-702 and Fleury Hist Eccles tom v p 1 etc but the latter for want of authentic materials has given too much credit to the legend of Metaphrastes

15 This story (Zosimus I v [c 3] p 290) proves that the hymeneal rites of antiquity were still practised without idolatry by the Christians of the East and the bride was forcibly conducted from the house of her parents to that of her husband Our form of marriage requires with less delicacy the express and public consent of a virgin

16 Zosimus (I v [c 4] p 290) Orosius (I vii c 37) and the Chronicle of Marcellinus Claudian (in Rufin 1 7-100) paints in lively colours the distress and guilt of the prefect

17 Stilicho directly or indirectly is the perpetual theme of Claudian The youth and private life of the hero are vaguely expressed in the poem on his first consulship 35-140

18 Vandalorum imbellis avaræ perfidæ et dolosæ gentis genere editus Orosius (I vii c 38) Jerom (tom 1 ad Gerontium p 93) calls him a semi barbarian

19 Claudian in an imperfect poem has drawn a fair perhaps a flattering portrait of Serena That favourite niece of Theodosius was born as well as her sister Thermantia, in Spain from whence in their earliest youth they were honourably conducted to the palace of Constantinople

20 Some doubt may be entertained whether this adoption was legal or only metaphorical (see Ducang Fam. Byzant p 75) An old inscription gives Stilicho the singular title of Pro-gener Dni Theodori

21 Claudian (Laus Serenæ 190 193) expresses in poetic language the "flectus equorum" and the geminæ tox idem culmine du it agmina The inscription adds count of the domestics an important command which Stilicho in the height of his grandeur might prudently retain

22 The beautiful lines of Claudian (in I. Cons Stilich. ii. 113) display his genius but the integrity of Stilicho (in the military administration) is much more firmly established by the unwilling evidence of Zosimus (I v [c 34] p 345)

23 ————— Si bellica nubes
Ingrueret quamvis annis et iure minor, Cedere grandævus equitum peditumque magistros
Adspiceret
Claudian Laus Seren v 106 etc.

A modern general would deem their subservience either heroic patriotism or abject servility

24 Compare the poem on the first consulship (1 95-115) with the Laus Serenæ (227-237) where it unfortunately breaks off We may perceive the deep inveterate malice of Rufinus

25 ————— Quem fratribus ipse
Discedens clipeum defensoremque
disti (iv Cons Hon 432)

Yet the nomination was private (iii Cons. Hon. 142) cunctos discedere jubet—and may therefore be suspected Zosimus and Suidas apply to Stilicho and Rufinus the same equal title of Erli poroi guardians or procurators

26 The Roman law distinguishes two sorts of minority which expired at the age of fourteen and of twenty five The one was subject to the law or guardianship of the person the other to the curatorial or trustee of the estate (Heineccius Antiquitat. Rom. ad Jurisprudens pertinent l. i. tit. xxi. xxi. p 218-232) But these legal ideas were never accurately transferred into the constitution of an elective monarchy

27 See Claudian (1 Cons Stilich. 1 188-242) but he must allow more than fifteen days for the journey and return between Milan and Leyden

28 I Cons Stilich. ii. 88-94 Not only the robes and diadems of the deceased emperor but even the helmets sword hilts belts cuirasses etc. were enriched with pearls emeralds and diamonds

29 ————— Tantoque remoto
Principe mutatas orbis non sensit habenas

This high commendation (1 Cons Stil. i. 149) may be justified by the fears of the dying emperor (de Bell Gildon 292-301) and the peace and good order which were enjoyed after his death (1 Cons Stil. i. 150-168)

30 Stilicho's march and the death of Rufinus are described by Claudian (in Rufin I. ii. 101 453) Zosimus (I v [c. 7] p 296 297) Socrates (I viii c 1) Socrata (I vi. c 1) Philostorgius (I xi c 3 with Godefroy p 441) and the Chronicle of Marcellinus

31 The dissection of Rufinus which Claudian performs with the savage coolness of an anatomist (in Rufin ii. 405-415) is likewise specified by Zosimus (I v [c. 7] and Jerom (tom. I. p 26 [Epist. II. tom 1 p 342 ed Vallars])

32 The Pagan Zosimus mentions their sanctuary and pilgrimage The sister of Rufinus Sylviana who passed her life at Jerusalem is famous in monastic history 1 The studious virgin had diligently and even repeatedly perused the commentators on the Bible Origen Gregory Euseb.

etc., to the amount of five millions of lines 2 At the age of threescore she could boast that she had never washed her hands, face, or any part of her whole body, except the tips of her fingers, to receive the communion See the Vitæ Patrum, p 779, 977

33 See the beautiful exordium of his invective against Rufinus, which is curiously discussed by the sceptic Bayle, Dictionnaire Critique, RUFIN Not E

34 See the Theodosian Code, l ix tit xii leg 14, 15 The new ministers attempted, with inconsistent avarice, to seize the spoils of their predecessor and to provide for their own future security

35 See Claudian (i Cons Stilich l i 275, 292, 296, l ii 83), and Zosimus, l v [c 11] p 302

36 Claudian turns the consulship of the eunuch Eutropius into a national reflection (l ii 135)

Plaudenter cerne senatum,

Et Byzantinos proceres, Gratosque Quirites

O patribus plebes, O digni consule patres

It is curious to observe the first symptoms of jealousy and schism between old and new Rome, between the Greeks and Latins

37 Claudian may have exaggerated the vices of Gildo, but his Moorish extraction, his notorious actions, and the complaints of St Augustin, may justify the poet's invectives Baronius (Annal Eccles AD 398, No 35-56) has treated the African rebellion with skill and learning

38 Instat terribilis vivis, morientibus hæres, Virginibus raptor, thalamis obscenus
adulter

Nulla quies oritur prædâ cessante libido, Divitibusque dies, et nox metuenda manditus

————Mauris clarissima quæque
Fastidita datur

De Bello Gildonico, 165, 189

Baronius condemns, still more severely, the licentiousness of Gildo, as his wife, his daughter, and his sister, were examples of perfect chastity The adulteries of the African soldiers are checked by one of the Imperial laws

39 Inque tuam sortem numerosas transtulit
urbes

Claudian (de Bell Gildonico, 230-324) has touched, with political delicacy, the intrigues of the Byzantine court, which are likewise mentioned by Zosimus (l v [c 11] p 302)

40 Symmachus (l iv epist 4) expresses the judicial forms of the senate, and Claudian (i Cons Stilich l i 325, etc) seems to feel the spirit of a Roman

41 Claudian finely displays these complaints of Symmachus, in a speech of the goddess of Rome before the throne of Jupiter (de Bell Gildon 28-128)

42 See Claudian (in Eutrop l i 401, etc., i Cons Stil l i 306, etc., ii Cons Stilich 91, etc.)

43 He was of a mature age, since he had formerly (AD 373) served against his brother Firmus (Ammian xxix. 5) Claudian, who understood the court of Milan, dwells on the injuries, rather than the merits, of Masezel (de Bell Gild 389-414) The Moorish war was not worthy of Honorius or Stilicho, etc

44 Claudian, Bell Gild 415-423 The change of discipline allowed him to use indifferently the names of Legio, Cohors, Manipulus See the Noctia Imperii, S 38, 40

45 Orosius (l vii = 36, p 565) qualifies this account with an expression of doubt (ut aunt) and it scarcely coincides with the divâpμει ἀδρας of Zosimus (l v [c 11] p 303) Yet Claudian, after some declamation about Cadmus's soldiers, frankly owns that Stilicho sent a small army, lest the rebel should fly, ne timeare times (i Cons Stilich. l i 314, etc)

46 Claud Rutil Numatian Itinerar lib i 439-448 He afterwards (ib 515-526) mentions religious madman on the isle of Gorgona For such profane remarks, Rutilius and his accomplices are styled, by his commentator Barthius, rabiosi cantes diaboli Tillemont (Mém Eccles tom xii p 471) more calmly observes that the unbelieving poet praises where he means to censure

47 Orosius, l vii c 36, p 564. Augustin commends two of these savage saints of the Isle of Goats (Epist lxxxi apud Tillemont, Mém Eccles tom xiii p 317, and Baronius, Annal Eccles AD 398, No 51)

48 Here the first book of the Gildonic war is terminated The rest of Claudian's poem has been lost, and we are ignorant how or where the army made good their landing in Africa

49 Orosius must be responsible for the account The presumption of Gildo and his various train of barbarians is celebrated by Claudian (i Cons Stil l i 345-355)

50 St Ambrose, who had been dead about a year, revealed in a vision the time and place of the victory Masezel afterwards related his dream to Paulinus, the original biographer of the saint, from whom it might easily pass to Orosius

51 Zosimus (l v [c 11] p 303) supposes an obstinate combat but the narrative of Orosius appears to conceal a real fact under the disguise of a miracle

52 Tabraca lay between the two Hippos (Celarius, tom ii p 112, D Anville, tom iii p 84) Orosius has distinctly named the field of battle, but our ignorance cannot define the precise situation

53 The death of Gildo is expressed by Claudian (i Cons Stil l 357) and his best interpreters, Zosimus and Orosius

54 Claudian (iii Cons Stilich. 99-119) describes their trial (tremuit quos Africa nuper cernunt rostra reos), and applauds the restoration of the ancient constitution It is here that he introduces the famous sentence so familiar to the friends of despotism

————Unquam libertas gratior existit

Quam sub rege pio

But the freedom which depends on royal piety scarcely deserves that appellation.

55 See the Theodosian Code L ix tit xxxix leg 3 tit xl leg 19

56 Stilicho who claimed an equal share in all the victories of Theodosius and his son particularly asserts that Africa was recovered by the wisdom of his counsels (see an inscription produced by Baronius)

57 I have softened the narrative of Zosimus which in its crude simplicity is almost incredible (l v [c 11] § 303) Orosius damns the victorious general (p 538 [lib vii c 36]) for violating the right of sanctuary

58 Claudian as the poet laureat composed a serious and elaborate epithalamium of 340 lines besides some gay Fescennines which were sung in a more licentious tone on the wedding night

59 ————Calet obuius ire
Jam princeps tardumque cupit discedere solem

Nobilis haud aliter somper—
(de Nuptis Honor et Mariae 287) and more freely in the Fescennines 112-126 [iv 14]
Dices O quoties hoc mihi dulcius
Quam flavos decet vincere Sarmatas

Tum victor mandido protilias toro
Nocturni referens vulnera prelii
60 See Zosimus l v [c 28] § 333
61 Procopius de Bell Vandal l i c 2 [tom. i p 316 ed Bonn] I have borrowed the general practice of Honorius without adopting the angular and indeed improbable tale, which is related by the Greek historian
62 The lessons of Theodosius or rather Claudian (iv Cons Honor 214-418) might compose a fine institution for the future prince of a great and free nation It was far above Honorius and his degenerate subjects

Chapter XXX

1 The revolt of the Goths and the blockade of Constantinople are distinctly mentioned by Claudian (in Rufin l ii 7-100) Zosimus (l v [c 5] p 292) and Jordanes (de Rebus Geticis c 29)

2 ————Alis per terga ferocis
Danubi solidata ruunt expertaque remis
Frangunt stagna rotis

[Claud. ib v 24]
Claudian and Ovid often amuse their fancy by interchanging the metaphors and properties of liquid water and solid ice Much false wit has been expended in this easy exercise

3 Jerom. tom 1 p 26 [Epist lx. tom 1 p 342 ed. Vallara] He endeavours to comfort his friend Heliodorus bishop of Altinum for the loss of his nephew Nepotian by a curious recapitulation of all the public and private misfortunes of the times. See Tillemont Mém Ecclési tom xii p 200 etc

4 Baltha or bald origo mirifica says Jordanes (c. 29) This illustrious race long continued to flourish in France in the Gothic province of Septimania, or Languedoc under the corrupted appellation of Baus and a branch of that family afterwards settled in the kingdom of Naples (Grotius in Prolegom. ad Hist Goth. p 53) The lords of Baux near Arles and of seventy nine subordinate places were independent of the counts of Provence (Longueville Description de la France tom 1 p 357)

5 Zosimus (l v [c. 5] p 293-295) is our best guide for the conquest of Greece but the hints and allusion of Claudian are so many rays of historic light

6 Compare Herodotus (l vii. c. 176) and Livy (xxxvi 15) The narrow entrance of Greece was probably enlarged by each successive ravisher

7 He passed says Eunapius (in Vit. Philosph.

p 93 edit Cornuclen 1596) through the straits, ὁ δὲ τῶν τεύχεων (of Thermopylae) παρὰ τὴν εἰς τὸν ὁ ὁ σταθίου καὶ ἑκατοῦρου τεύχεων τῶν τεύχεων

8 In obedience to Jerom and Claudian (in Rufin l ii 191) I have mixed some darker colours in the mild representation of Zosimus who wished to soften the calamities of Athens

Nec fera Cecropias traxissent vincula matres.
Synesius (Epist cxxxv p 272 edit Petav) observes that Athens whose sufferings he imputes to the proconsul's avarice, was at that time less famous for her schools of philosophy than for her trade of honey

9 ————Vallata mari Scironis rupes
Et duo continuis connectens ardua muro
Isthmos

Claudian de Bell Getico 188.
The Scironian rocks are described by Pausanias (l i. c. 44 p 107 edit Kuhn) and our modern travellers Wheeler (p 436) and Chandler (p 298) Hadrian made the road passable for two carriages [Pausan l c 44 § 6 ed Bekker]

10 Claudian (in Rufin l ii 186 and de Bello Getico 611 etc) vaguely though forcibly delineates the scene of rapine and destruction

11 Τῶν δὲ καὶ ἀνὰ τὸν αἰῶνα καὶ τὸν αἰῶνα etc. These generous lines of Homer (Odys l v 30f) were transcribed by one of the captive youths of Corinth and the tears of Murrinus may prove that the rude conqueror though he was ignorant of the value of an original picture possessed the purest source of good taste a benevolent heart (Plutarch Symposiac. l ix tom ii p 737 edit Weibel [tom. viii p. 939 ed Reiske])

12 Homer perpetually describes the exemplary patience of these feeble captives who gave their charms and even their hearts to the murderers of their fathers brothers, etc Such a passion (of Enphile for Achilles) ■ touched with admirable delicacy by Racine

13 Plutarch (in Pyrrhus) gives the genuine answer in the Laconic dialect Pyrrhus attacked Sparta with 25,000 foot, 2000 horse, and 24 elephants and the defence of that open town is a fine comment on the laws of Lycurgus, even in the last stage of decay

14 Such, perhaps, as Homer (Iliad, xx 164) has so nobly painted him

15 Eunapius (in Vit Philosoph p 90-93) intimates that a troop of monks betrayed Greece and followed the Gothic camp

16 For Stilicho's Greek war compare the honest narrative of Zosimus (I v [c 7] p 295, 296) with the curious circumstantial flattery of Claudian (i Cons Stilich I 1 172-186, iv Cons Hon 459-487) As the event was not glorious, it is artfully thrown into the shade

17 The troops who marched through Elis delivered up their arms This security enriched the Eleans, who were lovers of a rural life Riches begat pride they disdained their privilege, and they suffered Polybius advises them to retire once more within their magic circle See a learned and judicious discourse on the Olympic games, which Mr West has prefixed to his translation of Pindar

18 Claudian (in iv Cons Hon 480) alludes to the fact without naming the river, perhaps the Alpheus (i Cons Stil I 1 185)

—Et Alpheus Geticus angustus acervis

Tardior ad Sículos etiamnum pergit amores Yet I should prefer the Peneus, a shallow stream in a wide and deep bed which runs through Elis and falls into the sea below Cyllene It had been joined with the Alpheus to cleanse the Aegæan stable (Cellarius, tom 1 p 760 Chandler's Travels, p 286)

19 Strabo, l viii p 517 [p 335, ed Casaub] Plin Hist Natur iv 3 Wheeler, p 308 Chandler, p 275 They measured from different points the distance between the two lands

20 Synesius passed three years (A D 397-400) at Constantinople as deputy from Cyrene to the emperor Arcadius He presented him with a crown of gold, and pronounced before him the instructive oration de Regno (p 1-32, edit Petav Paris, 1612) The philosopher was made bishop of Ptolemais, A D 410, and died about 430 See Gillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xii p 499, 554, 683-685

Claudian in Eutrop I ii 212 Alaric applauds his own policy (de Bell. Getic. 533-543) in the use which he had made of this Illyrian jurisdiction

23 Jornandes, ■ 29, p 651 [ed Grot 1655, p 81, ed Lugd B 1597] The Gothic historian adds, with unusual spirit, Cum suis deliberans suavit suo labore quarere regna, quam alienis per otium subjacere.

24. —Discors odisque anceps civilibus orbis Non sua vis tutata diu, dum fœdera fallax Ludit, et alternæ perjuræ venditat aluæ

Claudian de Bell Get 565

25 Alpius Italiae ruptis penetrabis ad Urbem This authentic prediction was announced by Alaric, or at least by Claudian (de Bell Getico, 547), seven years before the event But as it was not accomplished within the term which had been rashly fixed, the interpreters escaped through an ambiguous meaning

26 Our best materials are 970 verses of Claudian, in the poem on the Getic war, and the beginning of that which celebrates the sixth consulship of Honorius Zosimus ■ totally silent, and we are reduced to such scraps, or rather crumbs, as we can pick from Orosius and the Chronicles

27 Notwithstanding the gross errors of Jornandes, who confounds the Italian wars of Alaric (c 29), his date of the consulship of Stilicho and Aurelian (A D 400) is firm and respectable It is certain from Claudian (Tillemont, Hist des Emp tom v p 804), that the battle of Pollentia was fought A D 403, but we cannot easily fill the interval

28 Tantum Romanæ urbis iudicium fugis, ut magis obsidionem barbaricam, quam pacatæ urbis iudicium velis sustinere. Jerom, tom ii. p 239 Rufinus understood his own danger, the peaceful city was inflamed by the beldam Marcella and the rest of Jerom's faction

29 Jovinian, the enemy of fasts and of celibacy, who was persecuted and insulted by the furious Jerom (Jortin's Remarks, vol ii p 104, etc.) See the original edict of banishment in the Theodosian Code, l xvi. tit v leg 53

30 This epigram (de Sene Veronensi qui surburium nusquam egressus est) is one of the earliest and most pleasing compositions of Claudian Cowley's imitation (Hurd's edition vol ii p 241) has some natural and happy strokes but it is much inferior to the original portrait, which is evidently drawn from the life

31 Ingentem meminit parvo qui germine quercum

Aquævumque videt consensuisse nemus A neighbouring wood born with himself he sees,

And loves his old contemporary trees

In this passage Cowley is perhaps superior to the original, and the English poet, who was a good botanist, has concealed the oaks under a more general expression

32 Claudian de Bell Get. 109-266 He may seem prolix but fear and superstition occupied a large space in the minds of the Italians

33 From the passages of Paulinus which Baronius has produced (Annal Eccles. A.D. 403 No 51) it is manifest that the general alarm had pervaded all Italy as far as Nola in Campania where that famous penitent had fixed his abode

34 Solus erat Stilicho etc. is the exclusive commendation which Claudian bestows (de Bell. Get. 267) without condescending to except the emperor. How insignificant must Honorius have appeared in his own court!

35 The face of the country and the hardness of Stilicho are finely described (de Bell. Get. 340-363)

36 Venit et extremis lepro praetenta Britannus
Quæ Scotæ dat frena truci

De Bell. Get. 416

Yet the most rapid march from Edinburgh or Newcastle to Milan must have required a longer space of time than Claudian seems willing to allow for the duration of the Gothic war

37 Every traveller must recollect the face of Lombardy (see Fontenelle tom. v. p. 379) which is often tormented by the capricious and irregular abundance of waters. The Austrians before Genoa were encamped in the dry bed of the Pocevera. Ne sarebbe (says Muratori) mai passato per mente a que buoni Alemanni che quel picciolo torrente potesse per così dire in un instante cambiarsi in un terribil gigante (Annal. d'Italia tom. xvi. p. 443 Milan 1753 8vo edit.)

38 Claudian does not clearly answer our question. Where was Honorius himself? Yet the flight is marked by the pursuit and my idea of the Gothic war is justified by the Italian critics. Sigonius (tom. i. p. 11 p. 360 de Imp. Occident. l. x.) and Muratori (Annal. d'Italia tom. iv. p. 43)

39 One of the roads may be traced in the Itineraries (p. 98 288 94. with Wesseling's Notes) Asia lay some miles on the right hand

40 Asia or Asi a Roman colony is now the capital of a pleasant county which in the sixteenth century devolved to the dukes of Savoy (Leandro Alberti Descrizione d'Italia p. 382)

41 Nec me timor impulit ullus. He might hold this proud language the next year at Rome five hundred miles from the scene of danger (vi. Cons. Hon. 449)

42 Hanc ego vel victor regno vel morte tenebo
Victus humum

The speeches (de Bell. Get. 479-549) of the Gothic Nestor and Achilles are strong characteristic adapted to the circumstances and possibly not less genuine than those of Livy 43 Orosius (l. vii. c. 37) is shocked at the impiety of the Romans who attacked on Easter Sunday such pious Christians. Yet at the same time, public prayers were offered at the shrine of St. Thomas of Edessa for the destruction of the Arian robber. See Tillemont (Hist. des Emp. tom. v. p. 529) who quotes a homily which has been erroneously ascribed to St. Chrysostom.

44 The vestiges of Pollentia are twenty five miles to the south-east of Turin. Urbis in the same neighbourhood was a royal chase of the kings of Lombardy and a small river which executed the prediction penetrabis ad urbem (Cluver Ital. Antiq. tom. i. p. 83-85)

45 Orosius wishes in doubtful words to magnify the defeat of the Romans. Punantibus victus victores victi sumus. Prosper (in Chron.) makes it an equal and bloody battle but the Gothic writers Cassiodorus (in Chron.) and Jordanes (de Reb. Get. c. 30) claim a decisive victory

47 Claudian (de Bell. Get. 580-647) and Prudentius (in Symmach. l. ii. 694-719) celebrate without ambiguity the Roman victory of Pollentia. They are poetical and party writers yet some credit is due to the most suspicious witnesses who are checked by the recent notoriety of facts.

48 Claudian's peroration is strong and elegant but the identity of the Cimbric and Gothic fields must be understood (like Virgil's Philipp. Georg. l. 490) according to the loose geography of a poet. Vercellæ and Pollentia are sixty miles from each other and the latitude is still greater if the Cimbri were defeated in the wide and barren plain of Verona (Maffei Verona Illustrata p. 54-62)

49 Claudian and Prudentius must be strictly examined to reduce the figures and extort the historic sense of those poets

50 Et gravant en surain ses frères avantages
De mes états conquis enchaîner les images.

The practice of exposing in triumph the images of kings and provinces was familiar to the Romans. The bust of Mithridates himself was twelve feet high of massy gold (Greinsheim Supplement Liv. l. vii. c. 47)

51 The Gothic war and the sixth consulship of Honorius obscurely connect the events of Alaric's retreat and losses

52 Tæco de Alarico saepe victo saepe concluso semperque dimisso Orosius l. vii. c. 3 p. 56 Claudian (vi. Cons. Hon. 320) drops the curtain with a fine image

53 The remainder of Claudian's poem on the sixth consulship of Honorius describes the journey the triumph and the games (330-660)

54 See the inscription in Masco's History of the Ancient Germans vii. 12. The words are positive and indiscreet. Getarum nationem in omne ævum domitam etc.

55 On the curious though horrid subject of the gladiators consult the two books of the Saturnalia Lipsius who as an antiquarian is inclined to excuse the practice of antiquity (tom. i. p. 483-543)

56 Cod. Theodos. l. xv. tit. xii. leg. i. The Commentary of Godefroy affords large materials (tom. v. p. 396) for the history of gladiators

57 See the peroration of Prudentius (in Symmach. l. ii. 1121-1131) who had doubtless read the eloquent invective of Lactantius (Divin Institut. l. vi c. 20) The Christian apologists have not spared these bloody games, which were introduced in the religious festivals of Paganism

58 Theodoret, l. v c. 26 I wish to believe the story of St. Telemachus Yet no church has been dedicated, no altar has been erected, to the only monk who died a martyr in the cause of humanity

59 Crudele gladiatorum spectaculum et inhumanum nonnullis videri solet, et haud scio an ita sit, ut nunc fit Cicero Tusculan. ii 17 He faintly censures the abuse, and warmly defends the use, of these sports, oculis nulla poterat esse fortior contra dolorem et mortem disciplina Seneca (Epist. v. 1) shows the feelings of a man

60 This account of Ravenna is drawn from Strabo (l. v p. 327 [p. 213, ed. Casaub.]), Pliny (iii 20), Stephen of Byzantium (sub voce Ράβεννα, p. 651, edit. Berkel.), Claudian (in vi. Cons. Honor. 494, etc.), Sidonius Apollinaris (l. i. Epist. 5, 8), Jornandes (de Reb. Get. c. 29), Procopius (de Bell. Gothic. l. i c. 1 p. 309, edit. Louvre [tom. ii p. 8, ed. Bonn]), and Cluverius (Ital. Antiq. tom. i p. 301-307) Yet I still want a local antiquarian, and a good topographical map

61 Martial (Epigram. iii 56, 57) plays on the trick of the knave who had sold him wine instead of water, but he seriously declares that a cistern at Ravenna is more valuable than a vineyard Sidonius complains that the town is destitute of fountains and aqueducts, and ranks the want of fresh water among the local evils, such as the croaking of frogs, the stinging of gnats, etc.

62 The fable of Theodore and Honoria, which Dryden has so admirably transplanted from Boccaccio (Giornata iii. novell. viii) was acted in the wood of Chiassi, a corrupt word from Classis, the naval station, which, with the intermediate road or suburb, the Via Cæsaris, constituted the triple city of Ravenna

63 From the year 404 the dates of the Theodosian Code became sedentary at Constantinople and Ravenna See Godefroy's Chronology of the Laws, tom. i p. cxlviii, etc.

64 See M. de Guignes, Hist. des Huns, tom. i p. 179-189, tom. ii p. 295, 334-338

65 Procopius (de Bell. Vandal. l. i c. iii p. 182 [ed. Paris tom. i p. 319, ed. Bonn]) has observed an emigration from the Palus Mæotis to the north of Germany, which he ascribes to famine. But his views of ancient history are strangely darkened by ignorance and error

66 Zosimus (l. v c. 26) p. 331) uses the general description of the nations beyond the Danube and the Rhine. Their situation, and consequently their names, are manifestly shown, even in the various names which each ancient writer may have casually added

67 The name of Rhadagast was that of a local deity of the Obotrites (in Mecklenburg) A hero might naturally assume the appellation of his tutelary god but it is not probable that the barbarians should worship an unsuccessful hero See Mascou, Hist. of the Germans, viii 14

68 Olympiodorus (apud Photium, p. 180 [p. 57, ed. Bekker]) uses the Latin word Optimatus, which does not convey any precise idea I suspect that they were the princes and nobles with their faithful companions—the knights with their squires, as they would have been styled some centuries afterwards

69 Tacit. de Moribus Germanorum, c. 37

70 —Cujus agendi

Spectator vel causa fui,

Claudian, vi Cons. Hon. 439, is the modest language of Honorius, in speaking of the Gothic war, which he had seen somewhat nearer

71 Zosimus (l. v c. 26) p. 331) transports the war and the victory of Stilicho beyond the Danube A strange error, which is awkwardly and imperfectly cured by reading Ἀπὸ τοῦ Τάρτου (Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. tom. v p. 807) In good policy, we must use the service of Zosimus, without esteeming or trusting him

72 Codex Theodos. l. vii tit. viii leg. 16 The date of this law (A.D. 406, May 18) satisfies me, as it had done Godefroy (tom. ii p. 387), of the true year of the invasion of Radagaisus Tillemont, Pagi, and Muratori prefer the preceding year, but they are bound, by certain obligations of civility and respect, to St. Paulinus of Nola

73 Soon after Rome had been taken by the Gauls, the senate, on a sudden emergency, armed ten legions, 3000 horse and 42,000 foot—a force which the city could not have sent forth under Augustus (Livy, vii 25) This declaration may puzzle an antiquary, but it is clearly explained by Montesquieu

74 Machiavel has explained, at least as a philosopher, the origin of Florence, which insensibly descended, for the benefit of trade, from the rock of Fiesole to the banks of the Arno (Istoria Fiorentina, tom. i l. ii p. 36 London, 1747) The triumvirs sent a colony to Florence, which, under Tiberius (Tacit. Annal. i 79), deserved the reputation and name of a flourishing city See Culver Ital. Antiq. tom. i p. 507, etc.

75 Yet the Jupiter of Radagaisus, who worshipped Thor and Woden, was very different from the Olympic or Capitoline Jove The accommodating temper of polytheism might unite those various and remote deities but the genuine Romans abhorred the human sacrifices of Gaul and Germany

76 Paulinus (in Vit. Ambros. c. 50) relates this story, which he received from the mouth of Pan sophia herself a religious matron of Florence Yet the archbishop soon ceased to take an active part in the business of the world, and never became a popular saint

77 Augustine The City of God v. 23 Orontius l. vii c. 37, p. 567-571 The two friends wrote in Africa ten or twelve years after the victory and their authority is implicitly followed by Isidore of Seville (in Chron p 713 edit Grot.) How many interesting facts might Orosius have inserted in the vacant space which is devoted to pious nonsense!

78 Franguntur montes planumque per ardua Cæsar

Ducit opus pandit fossas turritaque summis

Disponit castella jugis magnoque recessu Amplexus fines saltus nemorosaque tetra

Et silvas vastaque feras indagine claudit

Yet the simplicity of truth (Cæsar de Bell Civ iii 44) is far greater than the amplifications of Lucan (Pharsal l vi. 29-63)

79 The rhetorical expressions of Orosius in arido et aspero montis iugo in unum ac parvum verticem are not very suitable to the encampment of a great army But Fæculæ only three miles from Florence might afford space for the head-quarters of Radagaisus and would be comprehended within the circuit of the Roman lines

80 See Zosimus l v [c 26] p 331 and the Chronicles of Prosper and Marcellinus

81 Olympiodorus (apud Photium p 180 [p 57 ed Bekk]) uses an expression (εὐφροσύνη) which would denote a strict and friendly alliance and render Stilicho still more criminal The pau-lisper retentus deinde interfectus of Orosius [p 570] is sufficiently odious

82 Orosius piously inhuman sacrifices the king and people—Agag and the Amalekites—without a symptom of compassion The bloody actor is less detestable than the cool unfeeling historian

83 And Claudian's muse was she asleep? had she been ill paid? Methinks the seventh conship of Honorius (A D 407) would have furnished the subject of a noble poem. Before it was discovered that the state could no longer be saved Stilicho (after Romulus Camillus and Marius) might have been worthily surnamed the fourth founder of Rome

84. A luminous passage of Prosper's Chronicle In tres paucos per dies principes dictis exercitus reduces the miracle of Florence, and connects the history of Italy Gaul and Germany

85 Orosius and Jerom positively charge him with instigating the invasion Excitata a Stilichone gentes etc They must mean indirectly He saved Italy at the expense of Gaul

86 The Count de Buat is satisfied that the Germans who invaded Gaul were the two thirds that yet remained of the army of Radagaisus See the Histoire Ancienne des Peuples de l'Europe (tom vii p 87 121 Paris 1772) an elaborate work which I had not the advantage of perusing till the year 1777 As early as 1771 I find the same idea expressed in a rough draught of the present History I have since observed a similar intimation in Mascou (viii 15) Such agreement without mutual communication may add some weight to our common sentiment

87 ——— Provincia missos

Expellet citius fasces quam Francia reges Quos dederis

Claudian (i Cons Stil l i 235 etc.) is clear and satisfactory These kings of France are unknown to Gregory of Tours but the author of the Gesta Francorum mentions both Sunno and Marcomir and names the latter as the father of Pharamond (in tom. ii p 543) He seems to write from good materials which he did not understand

88 See Zosimus (l vi [c 3] p 373) Orosius (l vii c 40, p 56) and the Chronicle of Gregory of Tours (l ii c 9, p 165 in the second volume of the Historiens of France) has preserved a valuable fragment of Renatus Profuturus Fingendus, whose three names denote a Christian a Roman subject and a semi barbarian 89 Claudian (i Cons Stil l ii 221 etc. l ii 180) describes the peace and prosperity of the Gallic frontier The Abbé Dubos (Hist Critique, etc. tom l p 174) would read Alba (a nameless rivulet of the Ardennes) instead of Albis and expatiates on the danger of the Gallic cattle grazing beyond the Elbe Foolish enough! In poetical geography the Elbe and the Hercynian signify any river or any wood in Germany Claudian is not prepared for the strict examination of our antiquaries.

90 ——— Geminasque viator

91 Jerom tom i p 93 [Epist cxviii c 16 tom i p 908 ed Vallars.] See in the first volume of the Historiens of France p 777 782 the proper extracts from the Carmen de Providenti Divitiâ, and Salvian The anonymous poet was himself a captive with his bishop and fellow-citizens

92 The Pelagian doctrine which was first agitated A D 405 was condemned in the space of ten years at Rome and Carthage St Augustin fought and conquered but the Greek church was favourable to his adversaries and (what is singular enough) the people did not take any part in a dispute which they could not understand

93 See the Mémoires de Guillaume du Bellay l vi In French the original reproof is less obvious and more pointed from the double sense of the word journée which alike signifies a day's travel or a battle

94 Claudian (i Cons Stil l ii 250) It is supposed that the Scots of Ireland invaded by sea the whole western coast of Britain and some slight credit may be given even to Nennius and the Irish traditions (Carte's Hist of England vol i p 169) Whitaker's Genuine History of the Britons p 109 The sixty-six Lives of St Patrick which were extant in the ninth century must have contained at many thousand lies yet we may believe that in one of these Irish invasions the future apostle was led away captive (Usher Antiquit Eccles Britann p 431 and Tillemont Mém Ecclési tom xvi p 456 782 etc)

95 The British usurpers are taken from Zosimus

(l. i v [c 2] p 371-375), Orosius (l. vii v 40, p 576, 577), Olympiodorus (apud Photum, p 180, 181 [p 57, ed Bekker]), the ecclesiastical historians, and the Chronicles. The Latins are ignorant of Marcus

96 Cum in Constantino inconstantiam excrarentur (Sidonius Apollinaris, l. v Epist 9, p 139, edit secund Surmond) Yet Sidonius might be tempted, by so fair a pun, to stigmatise a prince who had disgraced his grandfather

97 Begaude is the name which Zosimus applies to them perhaps they deserved a less odious character (see Dubos, Hist Critique, tom 1 p 203) We shall hear of them again

98 Verinianus, Didymus, Theodosius, and Lagodius, who in modern courts would be styled princes of the blood, were not distinguished by any rank or privileges above the rest of their fellow-subjects

99 These Honoriani or Honoriaci consisted of two bands of Scots or Attacotti, two of Moors, two of Marcomanni, the Victores, the Ascarii, and the Gallicani (Notitia Imperii, sect xxxviii edit Lab) They were part of the sixty-five Auxilia Palatina, and are properly styled τῶν ἀβλῆν τακτίς by Zosimus (l. vi [c 4] p 374)

100 ——— Comitantur cuntem
Pallor, et atra Fames, et saucia lividus ora
Luctus, et inferno stridentes agmine Morbi

Claudian in vi Cons. Hon 321, etc.

101 These dark transactions are investigated by the Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l'Europe tom vii c iii-viii p 69-206), whose laborious accuracy may sometimes fatigue a superficial reader

102 See Zosimus, l. v [c 29] p 334, 335 He interrupts his scanty narrative to relate the fable of Amona, and of the ship Argo, which was drawn overland from that place to the Adriatic. Sozomen (l. viii c. 25 l. ix c 4) and Socrates (l. vi c. 10) cast a pale and doubtful light, and Orosius (l. vii c 38, p 571) is abominably partial 103 Zosimus, l. v [c 29] p 338, 339 He repeats the words of Lampadius as they were spoken in Latin, "Non est ista pax, sed pactio servitutis," and then translates them into Greek for the benefit of his readers.

104. He came from the coast of the Euxine, and exercised a splendid office, λαμπὰς δὲ ἐπαρτίας ἐκ τοῦ βασιλείου ἡγεμὸν His actions justify his character, which Zosimus (l. v [c 32] p 340) expresses with visible satisfaction Augustin revered the piety of Olympius whom he styles a true son of the church (Baronius, Annal. Eccles. a d 408, No 10 etc., Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. tom xii p 467, 468) But these praises which the African sent so unworthily bestows, might proceed as well from ignorance as from adulation

105. Zosimus, l. v [c. 31] p 338, 339 Sozomen,

l. ix c 4. Stilicho offered to undertake the journey to Constantinople, that he might divert Honorius from the vain attempt The Eastern empire would not have obeyed, and could not have been conquered

106 Zosimus (l. v [c 30, seq] p 336-345) has copiously, though not clearly, related the disgrace and death of Stilicho Olympiodorus (apud Phot p 177 [p 56, ed Bekker]), Orosius (l. vii c 38, p 571, 572), Sozomen (l. ix c 4), and Philostorgius (l. xi c 3, l. xii c 2), afford supplemental hints

107 Zosimus, l. v [c. 28] p 333 The marriage of a Christian with two sisters scandalises Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs, tom v p 557), who expects, in vain, that Pope Innocent I should have done something in the way either of censure or of dispensation

108 Two of his friends are honourably mentioned (Zosimus, l. v [c 35] p 346)—Peter, chief of the school of notaries, and the great chamberlain Deuterius Stilicho had secured the bedchamber and it is surprising that, under a feeble prince, the bedchamber was not able to secure him

109 Orosius (l. vii c 38, p 571, 572) seems to copy the false and furious manifestos which were dispersed through the provinces by the new administration

110 See the Theodosian Code, l. vii tit xvi leg 1, l. ix tit xlii leg 22 Stilicho is branded with the name of predo publicus, who employed his wealth ad omnem distandam, inquietandamque Barbariam

111 Augustin himself is satisfied with the effectual laws which Stilicho had enacted against heretics and idolaters, and which are still extant in the Code. He only applies to Olympius for their confirmation (Baronius, Annal. Eccles. a d 408, No 19)

112 Zosimus, l. v [c 38] p 351 We may observe the bad taste of the age in dressing their statues with such awkward finery

113 See Rutilius Numatianus (Itinerar l. ii 41-60), to whom religious enthusiasm has dictated some elegant and forcible lines Stilicho likewise stripped the gold plates from the doors of the Capitol, and read a prophetic sentence which was engraven under them (Zosimus l. v [c 38] p 352) These are foolish stories yet the charge of improbitas adds weight and credit to the praise, which Zosimus reluctantly bestows of his virtues

114 At the nuptials of Orpheus (a modest comparison) all the parts of animated nature contributed their various gifts, and the gods themselves enriched their favourite. Claudian had neither flocks nor herds nor vines, nor olives His wealthy bride was hence to them all Put he carried to Africa a recommendatory letter from Serena his Juno and was made happy (Epist. ii. ad Serenam)

115. Claudian feels it a honour like a man who deserved it (in prefat Bell. Get.) The original inscription on marble, was found at Rome in fifteenth century in the house of Pomponius Lettus. The statue of a poet far superior to Claudian should have been erected during his lifetime by the men of letters his countrymen and contemporaries. It was a noble design.

116 See Epigram xxx —

Mallius indulget somno noctesque di-esque

Insomnis Pharus sacra profana rapt
Omnibus hoc Italæ gentes exposcite votis

Mallius ut vigilet dormiat ut Pharus

Hadrian was a Pharian (of Alexandria). See his public life in Godefroy Cod Theodor. tom vi p 364. Mallius did not always sleep. He composed some elegant dialogues on the Greek systems of natural philosophy (Claud in Mall. Theodor. Cons 61-112).

117 See Claudian's first Epistle. Yet in some places an air of irony and indignation betrays his secret reluctance.

118 National vanity has made him a Florentine or a Spaniard. But the first Epistle of Claudian proves him a native of Alexandria (Fabricius Biblioth. Latin. tom iii. p 191-202 edit Ernest.)

119 His first Latin verses were composed during the consulship of Probus. A.D. 395 —

Romanos hibimus primum te consule fontes

Et Latine cessat Græcia Thalia togæ.

Besides some Greek epigrams which are still extant the Latin poet had composed in Greek, the Antiquities of Tarsus Anazarbus Berytus Sic., etc. It is more easy to supply the loss of good poetry than of authentic history.

120 Strada (Prolusion v. vi.) allows him to contend with the five heroic poets Lucretius Virgil Ovid Lucan and Statius. His patron is the accomplished courtier Balthazar Castiglione. His admirers are numerous and passionate. Yet the rigid critics reproach the exotic weeds or flowers which spring too luxuriantly in his Latin soil.

Chapter XXXI

1 The series of events from the death of Stilicho to the arrival of Alaric before Rome can only be found in Zosimus I. v. [c. 33-37] p 337-350.

2 The expression of Zosimus is strong and lively κα ἀπόρησι ἐκείνηται τοῖς π λαλοῖσι ἀπὸ τῶν ras sufficient to excite the contempt of the enemy.

3 Los qui catholicæ sectæ sunt inimici intra palatium militare prohibemus. Nullus nobis sit aliquâ ratione conjunctus qui a nobis fide et religione discordat. Cod Theodor. I. xvi. tit. v. leg. 42. and Godefroy's Commentary tom vi p 164. This law was applied in the utmost latitude and rigorously executed. Zosimus I. v. [c. 46] p 364.

4 Addison (see his Works vol. li p 54 edit Baskerville) has given a very picturesque description of the road through the Apennine. The Goths were not at leisure to observe the beauties of the prospect but they were pleased to find that the Saxa Interclia a narrow passage which Vespasian had cut through the rock (Cluver Italia Antiq. tom. i p 618) was totally neglected.

¶ Hinc albi Cliturnæ Gregeæ et maxima
taurus

Victima sæpe tuo perfusa flumine sacro Romanos ad templâ Deum duxere triumphos

Georg. II. 147

Besides Virgil most of the Latin poets Propertius Lucan Silius Italicus Claudian etc. whose passages may be found in Cluverius and Addison have celebrated the triumphal victories of Cliturnus.

6 Some ideas of the march of Alaric are borrowed from the journey of Honorius over the same ground (see Claudian in vi. Cons. Hon. 494-522). The measured distance between Ravenna and Rome was 254 Roman miles. Itinerar. Wesseling, p 126.

7 The march and retreat of Hannibal are described by Livy I. xxvi. c. 7 8 9, 10, 11 and the reader is made a spectator of the interesting scene.

8 These comparisons were used by Cinesas the counsellor of Pyrrhus after his return from his embassy in which he had diligently studied the discipline and manners of Rome. See Plutarch in Pyrrhus.

9 In the three census which were made of the Roman people about the time of the second Punic war the numbers stand as follows (see Livy Epit. tom I. xx. Hist. I. xxvii. 36. xxix. 37. 270 215 137, 108 21 1000. The fall of the second and the rise of the third appears so enormous that several census notwithstanding the unanimity of the MSS. have suspected some corruption of the text of Livy (See Drakenbroch ad xxvii. 36 and Beaufort République Romaine tom I. p 325). They did not consider that the second census was taken only at Rome and that the numbers were diminished not only by the death but likewise by the absence of many soldiers. In the third census Livy expressly affirms that the legions were mustered by the care of particular commissaries. From the numbers on the list we must always deduct one-twelfth above threescore and incapable of bearing arms. See Population de la France p 72.

10 Livy considers these two incidents as the effects only of chance and courage. I suspect that they were both managed by the admirable policy of the senate.

11 See Jerom tom. i p 169 170 ad Eusebium [Epist. cxi. tom. i p 684 ed Vallart] he bestows on Paula the splendid titles of Græchorum stupor soboles Scipionum Pauli hæres cujus vocabulum trahit Martiæ Papyriæ Matris Africani.

vera et germana propago This particular description supposes a more solid title than the surname of Julius, which Toxotius shared with a thousand families of the western provinces See the Index of Tacitus, of Gruter's Inscriptions, etc

11 Tacitus (Annal iii 55) affirms that, between the battle of Actium and the reign of Vespasian, the senate was gradually filled with new families from the Municipia and colonies of Italy

13 Nec quisquam Procerum tentet (licet ære vetusto Floreat, et claro cingatur Roma senatû)

Se jactare parem, sed primâ sede relictâ
Auchenus, de jure licet certare secundo

Claud in Prob et Olybrii Coss 18

Such a compliment paid to the obscure name of the Auchenii has amazed the critics, but they all agree that, whatever may be the true reading, the sense of Claudian can be applied only to the Anician family

14 The earliest date on the annals of Pighius is that of M Anicius Gallus, Trib Pl AUG 506 Another Tribune, Q Anicius, AUG 508, is distinguished by the epithet of Prencipatus Livy (xlv 43) places the Anicii below the great families of Rome

15 Livy, xlv 30, 31, xlv 3, 26, 43 He fairly appreciates the merit of Anicius, and justly observes that his fame was clouded by the superior lustre of the Macedonian, which preceded the Illyrian, triumph

16 The dates of the three consulships are AUG 593, 818, 967 the two last under the reigns of Nero and Caracalla The second of these consulships distinguished himself only by his infamous flattery (Tacit Annal xv 74), but even the evidence of crimes, if they bear the stamp of greatness and antiquity, is admitted, without reluctance, to prove the genealogy of a noble house

17 In the sixth century the nobility of the Anician name is mentioned (Cassiodor Variar l x Ep 11, 12) with singular respect by the minister of a Gothic king of Italy

(Claudian in Prob et Olyb Consulit 12, etc) The Anni, whose name seems to have merged in the Anician, mark the East with many consulships from the time of Vespasian to the fourth century

19 The title of first Christian senator may be justified by the authority of Prudentius (in Symmach i 553) and the dislike of the Persians to the Anician family See Gillemont Hist des Empereurs, tom iv p 183 v p 44 Baron Annal A.D. 312, No 78 A.D. 322, No 2

21 Two Persian satraps travelled to Milan and Rome to hear St Ambrose and to see Probus (Paulin in Vit Ambros) Claudian (in Cons Probini et Olybri 30-60) seems at a loss how to express the glory of Probus

The poet lived at the time of the Gothic invasion A moderate palace would have covered Cincinatus's farm of four acres (Val Max iv 4, 7) In laxitatem ruris excurrunt, says Seneca, Epist 114 See a judicious note of Mr Hume, Essays, vol 1 p 562, last 8vo edition

26 This curious account of Rome in the reign of Honorius is found in a fragment of the historian Olympiodorus, ap Photium, p 197 [p 63, ed Bekker]

27 The sons of Alypius [Olympius in Bekker's ed], of Symmachus and of Maximus, spent, during their respective pretorships twelve or twenty, or forty, centenarii (or hundredweight of gold) See Olympiodorus ap Phot p 197 [p 63 ed Bekker] This popular estimation allows some latitude but it is difficult to explain a law in the Theodosian Code (l vi tit ix leg 5) which fixes the expense of the first pretor at 25,000 of the second at 20,000 and of the third at 15,000 solidi The name of solidi (see Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom xxviii p 727) was equally applied to a purse of 125 pieces of silver and to a small copper coin of the value of  $\frac{1}{125}$  part of that purse In the former sense the 25,000 solidi would be equal to £150,000 in the latter to five or six pounds sterling The one appears extravagant the other is ridiculous There must have existed some third and middle value which is here understood but ambiguity is an inexcusable fault in the language of laws enough that it was part of Agamemnon's inheritance Mém Ecclés tom xii p 85

29 Seneca Epist lxxiv His language is of the declamatory kind but declamation could scarcely exaggerate the avarice and luxury of the Romans. The philosopher himself deserved some share of the reproach if it be true that his rigorous exacting of Quadrings above three hundred thousand pounds which he had lent at high interest provoked a rebellion in Britain. (Dion Cassius l. xii [c. 2] p 1003) According to the conjecture of Gale (Antoninus's Itinerary in Britain p 92) the same Faustinus possessed an estate near Bury in Suffolk, and another in the kingdom of Naples

30 Volusius a wealthy senator (Tacit Annal iii 30) always preferred tenants born on the estate Columella who received this maxim from him argues very judiciously on the subject De Re Rusticâ l i c 7 p 408 edit Gesner Leipzig 1735

31 Valerius (ad Ammian xiv 6) has proved from Chrysostom and Augustin that the senators were not allowed to lend money at usury Yet it appears from the Theodosian Code (see Godefroy ad l. ii tit xxxii tom 1 p 230-239) that they were permitted to take six per cent or one half of the legal interest and what is more singular this permission was granted to the young senators

32 Plin Hist Natur xxxiii 50 He states the silver at only 4380 pounds which is increased by Lavy (xxx 45) to 100 023 the former seems too little for an opulent city the latter too much for any private sideboard

33 The learned Arbuthnot (Tables of Ancient Coins etc. p 153) has observed with humour and I believe with truth that Augustus had neither glass to his windows nor a shirt to his back Under the lower empire the use of linen and glass became somewhat more common

[Glass was in general use during the reign of Augustus and linen in that of Tiberius]

34 It is incumbent on me to explain the liberties which I have taken with the text of Ammianus 1 I have melted down into one piece the sixth chapter of the fourteenth and the fourth of the twenty eighth book 2 I have given order and connection to the confused mass of materials 3 I have softened some extravagant hyperboles and pared away some superfluities of the original 4 I have developed some observations which were insinuated rather than expressed With these allowances my version will be found not literal indeed but faithful and exact

35 Claudian who seems to have read the history of Ammianus speaks of this great revolution in a much less courtly style

Postquam jura ferox in se communia
Cæsar

Transtulit et lapsi mores desuetaque
priscus

Artibus in gremium pacis servile recessu
De Bell Gildonico v 49

36 The minute diligence of antiquarians has not been able to verify these extraordinary names I am of opinion that they were invented by the historian himself who was afraid of any personal satire or application It is certain however that the simple denominations of the Romans were gradually lengthened to the number of four five, or even seven pompous surnames as for instance, Marcus Mæcius Mæmmius Furius Balburius Cæcilianus Placidus See Norris Cenotaph. Pisan. Dissert iv p 438

37 The carroce or coaches of the Romans were often of solid silver curiously carved and engraved and the trappings of the mules or horses were embossed with gold This magnificence continued from the reign of Nero to that of Honorius and the Appian way was covered with the splendid equipages of the nobles who came out to meet St. Melania when she returned to Rome six years before the Gothic siege (Seneca Epist lxxvii Plin. Hist Natur xxxiii 49 Paulin Nolan apud Baron Annal Ecclés A D 397 No 5) Yet pomp was well exchanged for convenience and a plain modern coach that is hung upon springs is much preferable to the silver or gold carri of antiquity which rolled on the axle-tree and were exposed for the most part to the inclemency of the weather

38 In a homily of Asterius bishop of Amaia M. de Valois has discovered (ad Ammian xiv 6) that this was a new fashion that bears wolves, lions and tigers woods hunting matches etc. were represented in embroidery and that the more pious corcombs substituted the figure or legend of some favourite saint

39 See Pliny's Epistles 1 6 Three large wild boars were allured and taken in the toils without interrupting the studies of the philosophic sportsman

40 The change from the inauspicious word Avernus which stands in the text is immaterial. The two lakes Avernus and Lucrinus communicated with each other and were fashioned by the stupendous moles of Agrippa into the Julian port which opened through a narrow entrance into the gulf of Puteoli Virgil who resided on the spot has described (Georgic ii 161) this work at the moment of its execution and his commentators especially Catrou have derived much light from Strabo Suetonius and Dion Earthquakes and volcanoes have changed the face of the country and turned the Lucrine lake since the year 1538 into the Monte Nuovo See Camillo Pellegrino Discorsi della Campania Felice p 239 244 etc. Antonii Sanfelici Campania p 13

41 The regna Cumana et Puteolana loca cetero quivalde expetenda interpellantium autem multitudinem pacis fugienda Cicero ad Attic xiv 16

42 The proverbial expression of Cimmerian darkness was originally borrowed from the description of Homer (in the eleventh book of the Odyssey) which he applies to a remote and fabulous country on the shores of the ocean See Erasmus Adagia, in his Works, tom ii p 593, the Leyden edition

43 We may learn from Seneca Epist cxxiii, three curious circumstances relative to the journeys of the Romans 1 They were preceded by a troop of Numidian light horse, who announced by a cloud of dust the approach of a great man 2 Their baggage-mules transported not only the precious vases but even the fragile vessels of crystal and murra, which last is almost proved, by the learned French translator of Seneca (tom iii p 402-422), to mean the porcelain of China and Japan 3 The beautiful faces of the young slaves were covered with a medicated crust, or ointment, which secured them against the effects of the sun and frost

44 Distributio solemnium sportularum The sportule, or sportelle, were small baskets supposed to contain a quantity of hot provisions of the value of 100 quadrantes, or twopence halfpenny, which were ranged in order in the hall, and ostentatiously distributed to the hungry or servile crowd who waited at the door This indelicate custom is very frequently mentioned in the epigrams of Martial and the satires of Juvenal See likewise Suetonius, in Claud c 21, in Neron c 16 in Domitian c 4, 7 These baskets of provisions were afterwards converted into large pieces of gold and silver coin, or plate, which were mutually given and accepted even by the persons of the highest rank (see Symmach Epist iv 55, ix 124, and Muscell p 256 [ed Paris, 1604]), on solemn occasions, of consulships, marriages, etc

45 The want of an English name obliges me to refer to the common genus of squirrels, the Latin glis, the French lour, a little animal who inhabits the woods and remains torpid in cold weather (see Plin Hist Natur viii 82, Buffon, Hist Naturelle, tom viii 158 Pennant's Synopsis of Quadrupeds, p 289) The art of rearing and fattening great numbers of glis was practised in Roman villas as a profitable article of rural economy (Varro, de Re Rusticâ, iii 15) The excessive demand of them for luxurious tables was increased by the foolish prohibitions of the censors, and it is reported that they are still esteemed in modern Rome, and are frequently sent as presents by the Colonna princes (see Brotier, the last editor of Pliny, tom ii p 458, apud Barbou, 1779)

46 This game which might be translated by the more familiar names of fructac or ballgamion was a favourite amusement of the greatest Romans and old Mucius Scaevola, the lawyer, had the reputation of a very skilful player It was called ludus duodecim scriptorum, from the twelve scrips or lines On which equally divided the alceolus or table On these the two armies the white and the black each consisting of fifteen men, or calculi were regularly placed and alternately moved according to the laws of the game and the chances of the trince or dice Dr Hyde, who diligently traces the history and varieties of the rud ludum (a name of Persian etymology) from Ireland to Japan, pours forth on this trifling subject a copious torrent of classic and Oriental learning See Syntagma Dissertat tom ii p 217-405

47 Marius Maximus, homo omnium verbosissimus, qui et mythistoricus se voluminibus implicavit Vopiscus in Hist August p 242 [Vopisc Firm c i] He wrote the Lives of the Emperors from Trajan to Alexander Severus See Gerard Vossius de Historicis Latin i ii c. 3, in his Works, vol iv p 57

48 This satire is probably exaggerated The Saturnalia of Macrobius, and the Epistles of Jerom, afford satisfactory proofs that Christian theology and classic literature were studiously cultivated by several Romans of both sexes and of the highest rank

49 Macrobius, the friend of these Roman nobles, considered the stars as the cause, or at least the signs, of future events (de Somn Scipion l i c 19, p 68)

50 The histories of Livy (see particularly vi 36) are full of the extortions of the rich and the sufferings of the poor debtors The melancholy story of a brave old soldier (Dionys Hal l vi c 26, p 347, edit Hudson, and Livy, ii 23) must have been frequently repeated in those primitive times, which have been so undeservedly praised

51 Non esse in civitate duo millia hominum qui rem haberent Cicero, Offic ii 21, and Comment Paul Manut, in edit Gravz This vague computation was made AUC 649, in a speech of the tribune Philippus and it was his object, as well as that of the Gracchi (see Plutarch), to deplore, and perhaps to exaggerate, the misery of the common people

52 See the third Satire (60-125) of Juvenal, who indignantly complains, —Quamvis quota portio freta Achivi

Jampridem Syrus in Tiberim defluxit Orontes,

Et linguam et mores, etc

Seneca, when he proposes to comfort his mother (Consolat ad Helv c 6) by the reflection that a great part of mankind were in a state of exile, reminds her how few of the inhabitants of Rome were born in the city

53 Almost all that is said of the bread bacon, oil, wine, etc. may be found in the fourteenth book of the Theodosian Code which expressly treats of the poëte of the great cities See particularly the titles in xi xii xiii xiv The collateral testimonies are produced in Godefroy's Commentarius, and it is needless to transcribe them According to a law of Theodosius which appreciates in money the military allowance a piece of gold (eleven shillings) was equivalent to eighty pounds of bacon or to eighty pounds of oil or to twelve modii (or pecks) of salt (Cod Theod l viii tit ii leg 17) This equation compared with an other seventy pounds of bacon for a modius (l Theod I xiv tit iv leg 4) fixes the price of wine at about sixteenpence the gallon.

54 The anonymous author of the Description of the World (p 14 in tom iii Geograph Minor Husdon) observes of Lucania in his barbarous Latin Regio optima et ipsa omnibus habundans et lardum multum foras emittit propter quod est in montibus cujus rescant animalium variam

59 Seneca (Epistol lxxxvi) compares the baths of Scipio Africanus at his villa of Linternum with the magnificence (which was continually increasing) of the public baths of Rome long before the stately Thermæ of Antoninus and Diocletian were erected The quadrans paid for admission was the quarter of the as about one-eighth of an English penny

60 Ammianus (I xiv c 6 and I xxviii c 4) after describing the luxury and pride of the nobles of Rome exposes with equal indignation the vices and follies of the common people

61 Juvenal Satur xi 191 etc The expressions of the historian Ammianus are not less strong and animated than those of the satirist and both the one and the other painted from the life The numbers which the great Circus was capable of receiving are taken from the original Notitie of the city The differences between them prove that they did not transcribe each other but the sum may appear incredible though the country on these occasions flocked to the city

62 Sometimes indeed they composed original pieces

—Vestigia Græca

Ausi deserere ꝑ celebrare domestica facta Horat Epistol ad Pionem 285 and the learned though perplexed note of Dacier who might have allowed the name of tragedies to the Brutus and the Denus of Pacuvius or to the Colo of Maternus The Octavia ascribed to one of the Senecas still remains a very unfavourable specimen of Roman tragedy

63 In the time of Quintilian and Pliny a tragic poet was reduced to the imperfect method of hiring a great room and reading his play to the company whom he invited for that purpose (See Dialog de Oratoribus, c 9 10 and Plin Epistol vii 17)

64 See the dialogue of Lucian entitled de Satatione tom. ii p 265-317 edit Reitz The pantomimes obtained the honourable name of ἡρώδης and it was required that they should be conversant with almost every art and science Burette (in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom 1 p 127 etc) has given a short history of the art of pantomimes

65 Ammianus I. xiv c 6 He complains with decent indignation that the streets of Rome were filled with crowds of females who might have given children to the state but whose only occupation was to curl and dress their hair and jactant volubilibus gyris dum expriment innumera mulacra quæ fivere fabulæ theatralis.

66 Lapsus (tom iii p 423 de Magnitud Romana I iii c 3) and Isaac Vossius (Observat Var p 26-34) have indulged strange dreams, of four or eight or fourteen millions in Rome. Mr Hume (Essays vol. i p 450-457) with admirable good sense and scepticism betrays some secret disposition to extenuate the populousness of ancient times

70 Read the whole third Satire but particularly 166 223 etc The description of a crowded insula or lodging house in Petronius (c 95 97) perfectly tallies with the complaints of Juvenal and we learn from legal authority that in the time of Augustus (Heineccius Hist Juris Roman c iv p 181) the ordinary rent of the several cenacula or apartments of an insula annually produced forty thousand sesterces between three and four hundred pounds sterling (Pandect I xiv. tit. ii. No 30) a sum which proves at once the large extent and high value of those common buildings

71 This sum total is composed of 1780 domus or great houses of 46 602 insula or plebeian habitations (see Nardini Roma Antica I iii p 83) and these numbers are ascertained by the agreement of the texts of the different Notitie Nardini I. viii p 498 500

72 See that accurate writer M. de Messance, Recherches sur la Population, p. 175-187. From probable or certain grounds he assigns to Paris 23,565 houses, 71,114 families, and 576,630 inhabitants.

73 This computation is not very different from that which M. Brotier, the last editor of Tacitus (tom. ii. p. 380), has assumed from similar principles, though he seems to aim at a degree of precision which it is neither possible nor important to obtain.

74 For the events of the first siege of Rome, which are often confounded with those of the second and third, see Zosimus, l. v. [c. 38-42] p. 350-354; Sozomen, l. ix. c. 6; Olympiodorus, ap. Phot. p. 180 [p. 57, ed. Bekk.]; Philostorgius, l. xii. c. 3, and Godefroy, Dissertation p. 467-475.

75 The mother of Læta was named Pissumena. Her father, family, and country are unknown. Dugange, Ad Byzantin p. 59.

76 Ad nefandos cibos erupit esurientium rabies, et sua invicem membra auarunt, dum mater non parit lactenti infantiae, et recipit utero, quem puellum ante effuderat. Jerom. ad Principiam, tom. i. p. 121 [Ep. cxviii. tom. i. p. 953, ed. Vallars.]. The same horrid circumstance is likewise told of the sieges of Jerusalem and Paris. For the latter, compare the tenth book of the Henriad, and the Journal de Henri IV. tom. i. p. 47-83, and observe that a plain narrative of facts is much more pathetic than the most laboured descriptions of epic poetry.

77 Zosimus (l. v. [c. 41] p. 355, 356) speaks of these ceremonies like a Greek unacquainted with the national superstition of Rome and Tuscany. I suspect that they consisted of two parts, the secret and the public: the former were probably an imitation of the arts and spells by which Numa had drawn down Jupiter and his thunder on Mount Aventine.

—Quid agant laqueis, quæ crimina dicant,

Quæque trahant superis sedibus iræ Jovenem,

Scire nefas homini.

The analia or shields of Mars, the pignora Imperii, which were carried in solemn procession on the calends of March, derived their origin from this mysterious event (Ovid Fast. iii. 259-398). It was probably designed to revive this ancient festival, which had been suppressed by Theodosius. In that case we recover a chronological date (March the 14, A.D. 400) which has not hitherto been observed.

78 Sozomen (l. ix. c. 6) insinuates that the experiment was actually though unsuccessfully made, but he does not mention the name of Innocent, and Tillmont (Mém. Ecclési. tom. x. p. 615) is determined not to believe that a pope could be guilty of such impious condescension.

79 Pepper was a favourite ingredient of the expensive Roman cookery, and the best sort commonly sold for fifteen denarii, or ten shillings, the pound. See Pliny, Hist. Natur. xii. 14. It was brought from India, and the same country, the coast of Malabar, still affords the greatest plenty; but the improvement of trade and navigation has multiplied the quantity and reduced the price. See Histoire Politique et Philosophique etc. tom. i. p. 457.

80 This Gothic chieftain is called, by Jornandes and Isidore, Althalphus; by Zosimus and Orosius, Ataulphus, and by Olympiodorus, Attila. I have used the celebrated name of Attila, which seems to be authorised by the practice of the Swedes, the sons or brothers of the ancient Goths.

81 The treaty between Alaric and the Romans, etc., is taken from Zosimus, l. v. [c. 41. 44] p. 354, 355, 358, 359, 362, 363. The addition of circumstances are too few and trifling, to require any other quotation.

82 Zosimus, l. v. [c. 48] p. 367, 368, 369.

83 Zosimus, l. v. [c. 45] p. 360, 361, 362. The bishop, by remaining at Ravenna, escaped the impending calamities of the city. Orosius, l. vii. c. 39, p. 573.

84 For the adventures of Olympius and his successors in the ministry, see Zosimus, l. v. [c. 46] p. 363, 365, 366, and Olympiodorus ap. Phot. p. 180, 181 [p. 57, ed. Bekk.].

85 Zosimus (l. v. [c. 46] p. 364) relates this circumstance with visible complacency, and celebrates the character of Gennerid as the first joy of expiring Paganism. Very different were the sentiments of the council of Carthage, who disputed four bishops to the court of Ravenna, to comply with the law which had been just enacted, that all conversions to Christianity should be free and voluntary. See Baronius, Annal. Ecclesiæ A.D. 400. No. 12, A.D. 410, No. 47, 48.

86 Zosimus, l. v. [c. 47-49] p. 367, 368, 369. This custom of swearing by the head, or life, or safety, or genius, of the sovereign, was of the highest antiquity, both in Egypt (Genes. xlii. 15) and Scythia. It was soon transferred, by flattery, to the Cæsars, and Tertullian complains that it was the only oath which the Romans of his time affected to reverence. See an elegant Dissertation of the Abbé Marnieu on the Oaths of the Ancients in the Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. i. p. 208, 209.

87 Zosimus, l. v. [c. 50] p. 368, 369. I have softened the expressions of Alaric, who expatiates in too florid a manner on the history of Rome.

88 See Sueton. in Claud. c. 20, Blas. Caes. l. ix. [c. 11] p. 99, edit. Reimar. and the lively description of Juvenal Sat. xii. 75, etc. In the sixteenth century, when the remains of this Augustan port were still visible, the antiquaries sketched the plan (see D'Anville Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom. xxi. p. 125) and declared with enthusiasm that all the monuments of Europe would be unable to execute a plan of a work (Bernier, Hist. des Grands Chefs de l'Architecture, tom. ii. p. 336).

89. The Ostia Tiberina (see Cluver Italia Antiqua I iii p 870-879) in the plural number the two mouths of the Tiber were separated by the Holy Island an equilateral triangle whose sides were each of them computed at about two miles. The colony of Ostia was founded immediately beyond the left or southern and the Port immediately beyond the right or northern branch of the river and the distance between their remains measures something more than two miles on Cingolani's map. In the time of Strabo the sand and mud deposited by the Tiber had choked the harbour of Ostia the progress of the same cause has added much to the size of the Holy Island and gradually left both Ostia and the Port at a considerable distance from the shore. The dry channels (fiumi morti) and the large estuaries (stagni di Ponente di Levante) mark the changes of the river and the efforts of the sea. Consult for the present state of this dreary and desolate tract the excellent map of the ecclesiastical state by the mathematicians of Benedict XIV an actual survey of the Agro Romano in six sheets by Cingolani which contains 113 819 rubbie (about 370 000 acres) and the large topographical map of Ametru in eight sheets.

90. As early as the third (Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel part II vol. iii p 89-92) or at least the fourth century (Carol a Sancto Paulo Notit Ecclesie p 47) the Port of Rome was an episcopal city which was demolished as it should seem in the ninth century by pope Gregory IV during the incursions of the Arabs. It is now reduced to an inn a church and the house or palace of the bishop who ranks as one of six cardinal bishops of the Roman church. See Eschinard Descrizione di Roma et dell' Agro Romano p 328.

91. For the elevation of Attalus consult Zosimus I vi [c 6 7] p 377-380 Sozomen I ix c 8 Olympiodorus ap Phot p 180 181 [p 57 ed Bekk] Philostorg I xii c 3 and Godefroy Dissemination p 470.

92. We may admit the evidence of Sozomen for the Arian baptism and that of Philostorgius for the Pagan education of Attalus. The visible joy of Zosimus and the discontent which he imputes to the Arian family are very unfavourable to the Christianity of the new emperor.

93. He carried his insolence so far as to declare that he should mutilate Honorius before he sent him into exile. But this assertion of Zosimus (I vi c 8) is destroyed by the more impartial testimony of Olympiodorus who attributes the ungenerous proposal (which was absolutely rejected by Attalus) to the baseness and perhaps the treachery of Jovius.

95. See the cause and circumstances of the fall of Attalus in Zosimus I vi [c 9-12] p 380-383 Sozomen I ix c 8 Philostorg I xii c 3. The two acts of indemnity in the Theodosian Code I ix tit xxviii leg 11 12 which were published the 12th of February and the 8th of August A.D 410, evidently relate to this usurper.

96. In hoc Alaricus imperatore, facto infecto, reflecto ac defecto mimum risit idum spectavit imperia Orosius I vii c 42 p 582.

97. Zosimus I vi [c 13] p 384 Sozomen I ix c 9 Philostorgius I xii c 3. In this place the text of Zosimus is mutilated and we have lost the remainder of his sixth and last book which ended with the sack of Rome. Credulous and partial as he is we must take our leave of that historian with some regret.

98. Adest Alaricus trepidam Romam obsidet turbat praecepit Orosius I vii c 39 p 573. He despatches this great event in seven words but he employs whole pages in celebrating the devotion of the Goths. I have extracted from an improbable story of Procopius the circumstances which had an air of probability. Procop de Bell Vandal I i c 2 [tom I p 315, ed. Bonn]. He supposes that the city was surprised while the senators slept in the afternoon but Jerom with more authority and more reason affirms that it was in the night nocte Moab capta est nocte cecidit murus ejus tom. I p 121 ad Principium [Epist cxxvii c 12 tom I p 933 ed Vallars].

99. Orosius (I vii c 39 p 573-576) applauds the piety of the Christian Goths without seeming to perceive that the greatest part of them were Arian heretics. Jornandes (c 30 p 633 [p 86, ed. Lugd. B. 1597]) and Isidore of Seville (Chron. p. 714, edit Grot.) who were both attached to the Gothic cause have repeated and embellished these edifying tales. According to Isidore, Alaric himself was heard to say that he waged war with the Romans and not with the Apostles. Such was the style of the seventh century two hundred years before the fame and merit had been ascribed not to the Apostles, but to Christ.

100. See Augustine The City of God I i c 1-6. He particularly appeals to the examples of Troy Syracuse and Tarentum.

101. Jerom (tom I p 121 ad Principium [Epist cxxvii c 933 ed Vallars]) has applied to the sack of Rome all the strong expressions of Virgil —

Quis cladem illius noctis quis funera lando

Explicit etc

Procopius (I i c 2 [tom. I p 316 ed Bonn]) positively affirms that great numbers were slain by the Goths. Augustine (The City of God I i c 12 13) offers Christian comfort for the death of those whose bodies (multa corpora) had remained (in tanta strage) unburned. Baronius from the different writings of the Fathers has thrown some light on the sack of Rome. Annal Eccles A.D 410 No 16-44.

102. Sozomen I ix c 10. Augustine (The City of God I i c 17) intimates that some virgins or matrons actually killed themselves to escape violation and though he admires their spirit he is obliged, by his theology, to condemn their rash presumption. Perhaps the good bishop of Hippo was too easy in the belief, as well as too rigid in the censure, of this act of female heroism. The twenty maidens (if they ever existed) who threw themselves into the Elbe when Magdeburg was taken by storm, have been multiplied to the number of twelve hundred. See Harte's History of Gustavus Adolphus, vol. 1 p. 308.

103 See Augustine, The City of God, I i c. 16-18. He treats the subject with remarkable accuracy and after admitting that there cannot be any crime where there is no consent, he adds, Sed qua non solum quod ad dolorem, verum etiam quod ad libidinem, pertinet, in corpore alieno perpetrari potest, quicquid tale factum fuerit, etsi retentam constantissimo animo pudicitiam non excutit, pudorem tamen incutit, ne credatur factum cum mentis etiam voluntate, quod fieri fortasse sine carnis aliquâ voluptate non potuit. In c. 18 he makes some curious distinctions between moral and physical virginity.

104. Marcella, a Roman lady, equally respectable for her rank, her age, and her piety, was thrown on the ground and cruelly beaten and whipped, cretam fustibus flagellisque, etc. Jerom, tom. 1 p. 121, ad Principiam [Ep. cxxvii c. 13, tom. 1 p. 953, ed. Vallars]. See Augustine, The City of God, I i c. 10. The modern Sacco di Roma, p. 108, gives an idea of the various methods of torturing prisoners for gold.

105. The historian Sallust, who usefully practised the vices which he has so eloquently censured, employed the plunder of Numidia to adorn his palace and gardens on the Quirinal hill. The spot where the house stood is now marked by the church of St. Susanna, separated only by a street from the baths of Diocletian, and not far distant from the Salarian gate. See Nardini, Roma Antica, p. 192, 193, and the great Plan of Modern Rome, by Nelli.

106. The expressions of Procopius are distinct and moderate (de Bell. Vandal. I i c. 2 [tom. 1 p. 316, ed. Bonn]). The chronicle of Marcellinus speaks too strongly, partem urbis Romæ cremavit, and the words of Philostorgius ἐν ἱερείοις ἡ νῆς νεκρῶν κειμένη (I xii c. 3) convey a false and exaggerated idea. Bærgius has composed a particular dissertation (see tom. 11 Antiquit. Rom. Græc.) to prove that the edifices of Rome were not subverted by the Goths and Vandals.

107. Orosius, I ii c. 19 p. 143. He speaks as if he disapproved all statues, vel Deum vel hominem æmulantur. They consisted of the kings of Alba and Rome from Aeneas, the Romans illustrious either in arms or arts, and the deified Cæsars. The expression which he uses of Forum is somewhat ambiguous, since there existed five principal fora but as they were all contiguous and adjacent, in the plan which is surrounded by the Capitoline the Quirinal, the Esquiline, and the Palatine hills, they might fairly be considered as one. See the

Roma Antiqua of Donatus, p. 162-201, and the Roma Antica of Nardini, p. 212-273. The former is more useful for the ancient descriptions, the latter for the actual topography.

108. Orosius (I ii c. 19, p. 142) compares the cruelty of the Gauls and the clemency of the Goths. Ibi vix quemquam inventum senatorem, qui vel absens evaserit, hic vix quemquam requiri, qui forte ut latens perierit. But there is an air of rhetoric, and perhaps of falsehood, in this antithesis, and Socrates (I vii c. 10) affirms, perhaps by an opposite exaggeration, that many senators were put to death with various and exquisite tortures.

113. As the adventures of Proba and her family are connected with the life of St. Augustin, they are diligently illustrated by Tillemont Mém. Ecclés. tom. xiii p. 620-635. Some time after their arrival in Africa, Demetrius took the veil and made a vow of virginity, an event which was considered as of the highest importance to Rome and to the world. All the Saints wrote congratulatory letters to her, that of Jerom is still extant (tom. 1 p. 62-73 ad Demetriad. de servandâ Virginitat. [Epist. cxxx tom. 1 p. 959 ed. Vallars]), and contains a mixture of absurd reasoning, spirited declamation, and curious facts, some of which relate to the siege and sack of Rome.

136 See the pictures of Adolphus and Placidia, and the account of their marriage, in Jornandes, de Reb. Geticis, c. 31, p. 654, 655 [p. 88, ed. Lugd. B.] With regard to the place where the nuptials were stipulated, or consummated, or celebrated, the MSS. of Jornandes vary between two neighbouring cities, Forl and Imola (Forum Livii and Forum Corneli). It is fair and easy to reconcile the Gothic historian with Olympiodorus (see Mascou, l. vii. c. 36) but Tillemont grows peevish, and swears that it is not worth while to try to conciliate Jornandes with any good authors.

137 The Visigoths (the subjects of Adolphus) restrained, by subsequent laws, the prodigality of conjugal love. It was illegal for a husband to make any gift or settlement for the benefit of his wife during the first year of their marriage, and his liberality could not at any time exceed the tenth part of his property. The Lombards were somewhat more indulgent: they allowed the morgengab immediately after the wedding night, and this famous gift, the reward of virginity, might equal the fourth part of the husband's substance. Some cautious maidens, indeed, were wise enough to stipulate beforehand a present which they were too sure of not deserving. See Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws, l. vii. c. 25. Muratori, delle Antichità Italiane, tom. 1. Dissertazione xv. p. 243.

138 We owe the curious detail of this nuptial feast to the historian Olympiodorus, ap. Photum, p. 185, 188 [p. 59, ed. Bekk].

139 See in the great collection of the Historians of France by Dom Bouquet, tom. ii. Gesta Regum Francorum, l. iii. c. 10, p. 191. The anonymous writer, with an ignorance worthy of his times, supposes that these instruments of Christian worship had belonged to the temple of Solomon. If he has any meaning, it must be that they were found in the sack of Rome.

140 Consult the following original testimonies in the Historians of France, tom. ii. Fredegarus Scholasticus Chron. c. 73, p. 441. Fredegar Fragment iii. p. 463. Gesta Regis Dagobert c. 29. p. 587. The accession of Suenand to the throne of Spain happened A.D. 631. The 200,000 pieces of gold were appropriated by Dagobert to the foundation of the church of St. Denis.

141 The president Goguet (Origine des Loix, etc., tom. ii. p. 239) is of opinion that the stupendous pieces of emerald, the statues and columns which antiquity has placed in Egypt at Gades at Constantinople, were in reality artificial compositions of coloured glass. The famous emerald dish which is shown at Genoa is supposed to counterbalance the suspicion.

to the custom of the Orientals, who ascribe to that prince every ancient work of knowledge or magnificence.

143 His three laws are inserted in the Theodosian Code, l. vi. tit. xviii. leg. 7, l. viii. tit. xi. leg. 12, l. xv. tit. xiv. leg. 14. The expressions of the last are very remarkable, since they contain not only a pardon, but an apology.

144 Olympiodorus ap. Phot p. 188 [p. 59, ed. Bekk]. Philostorgius (l. xi. c. 5) observes, that when Honorius made his triumphal entry he encouraged the Romans, with his hand and voice (χειρὶ καὶ γλῶσσῃ), to rebuild their city, and the Chronicle of Prosper commends Heracian, qui in Romanæ urbis reparationem strenuum exhibuerat ministerium.

145 The date of the voyage of Claudius Rutilius Numatianus is clogged with some difficulties, but Scaliger has deduced from astronomical characters that he left Rome the 14th of September, and embarked at Porto the 9th of October, A.D. 416. See Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. v. p. 820. In this poetical Itinerary, Rutilius (l. i. 115 etc.) addresses Rome in a high strain of congratulation.

Erige crinales lauros, seniumque sacrat

Verticis in virides, Roma, recinge comas, etc.

146 Orosius composed his history in Africa only two years after the event, yet his authority seems to be overbalanced by the improbability of the fact. The Chronicle of Marcellinus gives Heracian 700 ships and 3000 men: the latter of these numbers is ridiculously corrupt, but the former would please me very much.

147 The Chronicle of Idatius affirms, without the least appearance of truth, that he advanced as far as Otriculum, in Umbria, where he was overthrown in a great battle, with the loss of fifty thousand men.

148 See Cod. Theod. l. vi. tit. xiv. leg. 13. The legal acts performed in his name, even the manumission of slaves, were declared invalid till they had been formally repeated.

149 I have disdained to mention a very foolish, and probably a false, report (Procop. de Bell. Vandal. l. i. c. 2 (tom. i. p. 316, ed. Bonn)), that Honorius was alarmed by the loss of Rome till he understood that it was not a favourite chicken of that name, but only the capital of the world, which had been lost. Yet even this story is some evidence of the public opinion.

150 The materials for the lives of all these tyrants are taken from six contemporary historians: two Latins and four Greeks. Orosius l. vii. c. 42, p. 581, 582, 583. Renatus Profuturus Frigidus apud Gregor. Turon. l. ii. c. 9, in the Historians of France tom. ii. p. 165, 166. Zozimus l. vi. [c. 2] p. 370, 371. Olympiodorus apud Phot p. 188, 181, 184, 185, [p. 57, 57, ed. Bekk]. Sozomen l. ix. c. 12, 13, 14, 15, and Philostorgius l. xii. c. 5, 6, with Godofroy's Dissertations p. 477-481, besides the four Chronicles of Prosper, Lyto, Prosper of Aquitaine, Idatius, and Marcellinus.

151 The praises which Sozomen has bestowed on this act of despair appear strange and scandalous in the mouth of an ecclesiastical historian. He observes (p. 379 [ed. Cantab. 1720]) that the wife of Gerontius was a Christian and that her death was worthy of her religion and of immortal fame.

152 Εὐδὲ ἔστιν ὡς ἄλλοις = the expression of Olympiodorus which he seems to have borrowed from Æolus a tragedy of Euripides of which some fragments only are now extant (Euripid. Barnes tom. ii p. 443 ver. 38). This allusion may prove that the ancient tragic poets were still familiar to the Greeks of the fifth century.

153 Sidonius Apollinaris (l. v. Epist. 9 p. 139 and Not. Sirmond. p. 58) after stigmatising the inconsistency of Constantine the facility of Jovinus the perfidy of Gerontius continues to observe that all the vices of these tyrants were united in the person of Dardanus. Yet the prefect supported a respectable character in the world and even in the church held a devout correspondence with St. Augustin and St. Jerom. and was complimented by the latter (tom. iii p. 66) with the epithets of Christianorum Nobilissime and Nobilium Christianissime.

154. The expression may be understood almost literally. Olympiodorus says μὲλὸς σάκος ἢ ἔνδυμα Σακ (or σάκος) may signify a sack or a loose garment and this method of entangling and catching an enemy lacinis contortis was much practised by the Huns (Ammian. xxxi. 2). Il fut pris vis-à-vis avec des filets is the translation of Tille mont. Hist. des Empereurs tom. v p. 608.

155 Without recurring to the more ancient writers I shall quote three respectable testimonies which belong to the fourth and seventh centuries. The Expositio totius Mundi (p. 16 in the third volume of Hudson's Minor Geographers) Ausonius (de Claris Urbibus p. 247 edit. Toll.) and Isidore of Seville (Præfat. ad Chron. ap. Grotium. Hist. Goth. p. 707). Many particulars relative to the fertility and trade of Spain may be found in Nonnius Hispania Illustrata and in Hist. Hist. du Commerce des Anciens c. 40 p. 228-234.

156 The date is accurately fixed in the Fasti and the Chronicle of Idatius Orosius (l. vii c. 40 p. 578) imputes the loss of Spain to the treachery of the Honorians while Sozomen (l. ix c. 12) accuses only their negligence.

157 Idatius wishes to apply the prophecies of Daniel to these national calamities and is therefore obliged to accommodate the circumstances of the event to the terms of the prediction.

158 Mariana de Rebus Hispanicis l. v c. 1 tom. i p. 148 Hag. Comit. 1733. He had read in Orosius (l. vii c. 41 p. 579) that the barbarians had turned their swords into ploughshares and that many of the provincials preferred inter Barbaros pauperem libertatem quam inter Romanos tributariam solitudinem sustinere.

159 This mixture of force and persuasion may be fairly inferred from comparing Orosius and Jornandes the Roman and the Gothic historian.

160 According to the system of Jornandes (c. 33 p. 659 [ed. Grot.]) the true hereditary right to the Gothic sceptre was vested in the Amali but those princes who were the vassals of the Huns, commanded the tribes of the Ostrogoths in some distant parts of Germany or Scythia.

161 The murder is related by Olympiodorus but the number of the children is taken from an epitaph of suspected authority.

162 The death of Adolphus was celebrated in Constantinople with illuminations and Circensian games (See Chron. Alexandrin.) It may seem doubtful whether the Greeks were actuated on this occasion by their hatred of the barbarians or of the Latins.

164. This supply was very acceptable. The Goths were insulted by the Vandals of Spain with the epithet of Truli because in their extreme distress they had given a piece of gold for a trula or about half a pound of flour. Olympiod. apud Phot. p. 189 [p. 60 ed. Bekk.]

165 Orosius inserts a copy of these pretended letters. Tu cum omnibus pacem habes omniumque obsides accipe nos nobis configimus nobis perimus tibi vincimus immortalis vero questus erit Republicæ tuæ ut utique pereamus (p. 586). The idea is just but I cannot persuade myself that it was entertained or expressed by the barbarians.

166 Romam triumphans ingreditur is the formal expression of Prosper's Chronicle. The facts which relate to the death of Adolphus and the exploits of Vallas are related from Olympiodorus (ap. Phot. p. 188 [p. 59 60 ed. Bekk.]) Orosius (l. vii c. 43 p. 584-587) Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis c. 31 32) and the Chronicles of Idatius and Isidore.

167 Ausonius (de Claris Urbibus p. 257-262 [No. 14]) celebrates Bourdeaux with the partial affection of a native. See in Salvian (de Gubern. Dei p. 228 Paris 1608) a florid description of the provinces of Aquitania and Novempopulania.

168 Orosius (l. vii c. 32 p. 550) commends the mildness and modesty of these Burgundians who treated their subjects of Gaul as their Christian brethren. Mascoiu has illustrated the origin of their kingdom in the four first annotations at the end of his laborious History of the Ancient Germans vol. ii p. 555-572 of the English translation.

169 See Mascoiu l. vii c. 43 44 45. Except in a short and suspicious line of the Chronicle of Prosper (in tom. i p. 638) the name of Pharamond is never mentioned before the seventh century.

The author of the Gesta Francorum (in tom ii p 543) suggests, probably enough, that the choice of Pharamond, or at least of a king, was recommended to the Franks by his father Marcomir, who was an exile in Tuscany

184 An inscription (apud Sirmond, Not id Sidon Appollinar p 59) describes a castle, cum muris et portis, tuitioni omnium, erected by Dardanus on his own estate near Sisteron in the second Narbonnese, and named by him Theopolis

185 The establishment of their power would have been easy indeed if we could adopt the impracticable scheme of a lively and learned antiquarian, who supposes that the British monarchs of the several tribes continued to reign, though with subordinate jurisdiction, from the time of Claudius to that of Honorius See Whitaker's History of Manchester, vol i p 247-257

186 Αλλ ὁμοῦ καὶ τῶν ἄλλων ἄρ αὐτοῖς ἔφερε Procopius, de Bell Vandal l i c 2 p 181 [ed Paris tom i p 318 ed Bonn] Britannia fertilis provinciae tyrannorum, was the expression of Jerom in the year 415 (tom ii p 255, ad Ctesiphont [Epist cxxvii c. 9 tom i p 1032, ed Valart]) By the pilgrims who resorted every year to the Holy Land the monk of Bethlem received the earliest and most accurate intelligence

Chapter XXXII

1 Father Montfaucon who by the command of his Benedictine superiors was compelled (see Longueruana tom i p 205) to execute the laborious edition of St Chrysostom in thirteen volumes in folio (Paris 1738) amused himself with extracting from that immense collection of morals some curious antiquities which illustrate the manners of the Theodosian age (see Chrysostom Opera tom xiii p 192-196) and his French Dissertation in the Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscriptions
tom xiii p 474-490

2 According to the loose reckoning that a ship could sail with a fair wind 1000 stadia or 125 miles in the revolution of a day and night Dio-dorus Siculus computes ten days from the Palus Mæotis to Rhodes and four days from Rhodes to Alexandria. The navigation of the Nile from Alexandria to Syene under the tropic of Cancer required as it was against the stream ten days more Diodor. Sicul. tom i l iii [c. 33] p 270 edit Wesseling He might without much impropriety measure the extreme heat from the verge of the torrid zone but he speaks of the Mæotis in the 47th degree of northern latitude as if it lay within the polar circle

3 Barthius who adored his author with the blind superstition of a commentator gives the preference to the two books which Claudian composed against Eutropius above all his other productions (Baillet Jugemens des Savans tom iv p 227) They are indeed a very elegant and spirited satire and would be more valuable in an historical light if the invective were less vague and more temperate

4 After lamenting the progress of the eunuchs in the Roman palace and defining their proper functions Claudian adds,

— A fronte recedant

Imperi;

In Eutrop. i 422

Yet it does not appear that the eunuch had assumed any of the efficient offices of the empire and he is styled only Præpositus sacri cubiculi in the edict of his banishment. See Cod. Theod. l. ix
tit. xl leg. 17

¶ Jamque oblita sui nec sobria divitis mens
In miseræ leges hominumque negotia ludat

Judicat eunuchus

Arma etiam violare parat

Claudian (in Eutrop. i 229-270) with that mixture of indignation and humour which always pleases in a satiric poet describes the insolent folly of the eunuch the disgrace of the empire and the joy of the Goths

— Gaudet cum viderit, hostis,

Et sentit jam decesse viros

6 The poet's lively description of his deformity
(i 110-125) is confirmed by the authentic testimony of Chrysostom (tom iii [in Eutrop. l. c. 3] p 384 edit Montfaucon) who observes that when the paint was washed away the face of Eutropius appeared more ugly and wrinkled than that of an old woman Claudian remarks (i 460) and the remark must have been founded on experience that there was scarcely any interval between the youth and the decrepit age of a eunuch

7 Eutropius appears to have been a native of Armenia or Assyria His three services which Claudian more particularly describes were these
— 1 He spent many years as the catamite of Ptolemy a groom or soldier of the Imperial stables
2 Ptolemy gave him to the old general Anathemus for whom he very skilfully exercised the profession of a pimp 3 He was given on her marriage to the daughter of Antheus and the future consul was employed to comb her hair to present the silver ewer to wash and to fan his mistress in hot weather See l. i 31-137

8 Claudian (l. i in Eutrop. 1-22) after enumerating the various prodigies of monstrous births, speaking animals showers of blood or stones,
double suns etc. adds with some exaggeration,
Omnia cesserunt eunucho consule monstra
The first book concludes with a noble speech of the goddess of Rome to her favourite Honorius deprecating the new ignominy to which she was exposed

9 Fl. Mallius Theodorus whose civil honours and philosophical works have been celebrated by Claudian in a very elegant panegyric

το δὲ θεῶν δέ σ' ἔδωκε τῶν πλοῦν ὡς drunk with riches, is the forcible expression of Zosimus (l. v [c. 10] p 301) and the avarice of Eutropius is equally exaggerated in the Lexicon of Suidas and the Chronicle of Marcellinus Chrysostom had often admonished the favourite of the vanity and danger of immo-durate wealth, tom. iii. p. 381 [in Eutrop. i. c. 1]

11 ————— certantum saepe duorum

Diversum suspendit onus cum pondere judei

Vergit, et in geminas nutat provincia lances

Claudian (i. 192-209) so curiously distinguishes the circumstances of the sale that they all seem to allude to particular anecdotes

12 Claudian (in Eutrop. i. 154-170) mentions the guilt and exile of Abundantius, nor could he fail to quote the example of the artist who made the first trial of the brazen bull which he presented to Phalaris See Zosimus, i. v. [c. 10] p. 302, Jerom, tom. i. p. 26 [Ep. lx. c. 16, tom. i. p. 342, ed. Vallars] The difference of place is easily reconciled, but the decisive authority of Asterius of Amasia (Orat. iv. p. 76, apud Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. v. p. 435) must turn the scale in favour of Pityus

13 Suidas (most probably from the history of Eunapius) has given a very unfavourable picture of Timasius The account of his accuser, the judges, trial, etc., is perfectly agreeable to the practice of ancient and modern courts (See Zosimus, i. v. [c. 9] p. 298, 299, 300) I am almost tempted to quote the romance of a great master (Fielding's Works, vol. iv. p. 49, etc., 8vo edit.), which may be considered as the history of human nature

14 The great Oryis was one of the spots in the sands of Libya, watered with springs, and capable of producing wheat, barley, and palm trees It was about three days' journey from north to south, about half a day in breadth, and at the distance of about five days' march to the west of Abydos, on the Nile See D'Anville, Description de l'Egypte, p. 186, 187, 188 The barren desert which encompasses Oasis (Zosimus i. v. [c. 9] p. 300) has suggested the idea of comparative fertility, and even the epithet of the happy island (Herodot. ii. 26)

15 The line of Claudian, in Eutrop. i. 180, Marmaricus clavis violatur caedibus Hammon, evidently alludes to his persuasion of the death of Timasius

16 Sozomen, i. viii. c. 7 He speaks from report, αὐτὸς ἐκ ἀκοῆς

17 Zosimus, i. v. [c. 9] p. 300 Yet he seems to suspect that this rumour was spread by the friends of Eutropius

18 See the Theodosian Code, i. ix. tit. 14, ad legem Corneliam de Sicanis, leg. 3, and the Code of Justinian, i. ix. tit. viii. ad legem Juliam de Majestate, leg. 5. The alteration of the title, from treason to treason, was an improvement of the Emperor Tribonian Godefroy, in a formal dissertation, which he has inserted in his Commentary, illustrates this law of Arcadius and explains all the doubtful passages which had been perverted by the jurisconsults of the darker ages See tom. iii. p. 88-111

19 Bartolus understands a simple and naked consciousness, without any sign of approbation or concurrence For this opinion, says Baldus, he is now roasting in hell For my own part, continues the discreet Heineccius (Element. Jur. Civil. i. iv. p. 411), I must approve the theory of Bartolus, but in practice I should incline to the sentiment of Baldus Yet Bartolus was gravely quoted by the lawyers of Cardinal Richelieu, and Eutropius was indirectly guilty of the murder of the virtuous De Thou

20 Godefroy, tom. iii. p. 89 It is, however, suspected that this law, so repugnant to the maxims of Germanic freedom, has been surreptitiously added to the golden bull

21 A copious and circumstantial narrative (which he might have reserved for more important events) is bestowed by Zosimus (i. v. [c. 10, 199] p. 304-312) on the revolt of Tribigild and Gainas See likewise Socrates, i. vi. c. 6, and Sozomen, i. viii. c. 4 The second book of Claudian against Eutropius is a fine though imperfect piece of history

22 Claudian (in Eutrop. i. ii. 237-250) very accurately observes that the ancient name and nation of the Phrygians extended very far on every side, till their limits were contracted by the colonies of the Bithynians of Thrace, of the Greeks, and at last of the Gauls His description (ii. 257-272) of the fertility of Phrygia, and of the four rivers that produced gold, is just and picturesque

23 Xenophon, Anabasis, i. i. [c. 2, § 8] p. 11, 12, edit. Hutchinson, Strabo, i. viii. p. 865, edit. Amstel [p. 577, ed. Casaub.] Q. Curt. i. iii. c. 1 Claudian compares the junction of the Mürsyas and Meander to that of the Saône and the Rhône, with this difference, however, that the smaller of the Phrygian rivers is not accelerated but retarded by the larger

24 Selge, a colony of the Lacedaemonians, had formerly numbered twenty thousand citizens, but in the age of Zosimus it was reduced to a πολιχνη or small town See Cellarius, Geograph. Antiq. tom. ii. p. 117

25 The council of Eutropius, in Claudian, may be compared to that of Domitian in the fourth Satire of Juvenal The principal members of the former were, juvenes protervi lascivique senes, one of them had been a cook, a second a woolcomber The language of their original profession exposes their assumed dignity, and their trifling conversation about tragedies, dancers, etc., is made still more ridiculous by the importance of the debate

26 Claudian (i. ii. 376-461) has branded him with infamy and Zosimus in more temperate language, confirms his reproaches i. v. [c. 14] p. 305

27 The conspiracy of Gainas and Tribigild, which is attested by the Greek historians, had not reached the ears of Claudian who attributes the revolt of the Ostrogoth to his own marital infatuation and the advice of his wife

28 This anecdote which Philostorgius alone has preserved (l. xi c. iii and Gothofred Dissertat p 451-456) is curious and important since it connects the revolt of the Goths with the secret intrigues of the palace

29 See the Homily [i in Eutrop] of Chrysostom tom iii p 381-386 of which the exordium is particularly beautiful Socrates l. i c. 5 Sozomen l. viii c. 7 Montfaucon (in his Life of Chrysostom tom xiii p 135) too hastily supposes that Tribigild was actually in Constantinople and that he commanded the soldiers who were ordered to seize Eutropius Even Claudian a Pagan poet (Præfat ad l. ii in Eutrop 27) has mentioned the flight of the eunuch to the sanctuary

Suppliciterque piis humilis prostratus ad aras

Mitigat iratas voce tremente nurus

30 Chrysostom in another homily [in Eutr. ii. c. 1] (tom iii p 386) affects to declare that Eutropius would not have been taken had he not deserted the church Zosimus (l. v c. 18) p 313 on the contrary pretends that his enemies forced him (ἐκπαράγαυον αὐτόν) from the sanctuary Yet the promise is an evidence of some treaty and the strong assurance of Claudian (Præfat ad l. ii. 46)

Sed tamen exemplo non ferere tuo

may be considered as an evidence of some promise

31 Cod Theod l. ix. tit. xi leg. 14 [leg. 17] The date of that law (Jan. 17 A.D. 399) is erroneous and corrupt since the fall of Eutropius could not happen till the autumn of the same year See Tillemont Hist. des Empereurs tom v p 780

32 Zosimus l. v c. 18 p 313 Philostorgius l. xi c. 6

33 Zosimus (l. v c. 18-22) p 313-323 Socrates (l. vi c. 4 [6]) Sozomen (l. viii c. 4) and Theodoret (l. v c. 32-33) represent though with some various circumstances the conspiracy defeat and death of Gainas

34 Οὐκ ἔστιν Εὐαγγέλιον καὶ μαρτυρία is the expression of Zosimus himself (l. v c. 18) p 314, who inadvertently uses the fashionable language of the Christians Evagrius describes (l. i c. 3) the situation, architecture, relics and miracles of that celebrated church in which the general council of Chalcedon was afterwards held

35 The pious remonstrances of Chrysostom which do not appear in his own writings are strongly urged by Theodoret but his insinuation that they were successful is disproved by facts Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs tom v p 383) has discovered that the emperor to satisfy the rapacious demands of Gainas was obliged to melt the plate of the church of the Apostles

36 The ecclesiastical historians who sometimes guide and sometimes follow the public opinion most confidently assert that the palace of Constantinople was guarded by legions of angels

37 Zosimus (l. v c. 20) p 319 mentions these galleys by the name of Libumans and observes that they were as swift (without explaining the difference between them) as the vessels with fifty oars but that they were far inferior in speed to the triremes which had been long disused Yet he reasonably concludes from the testimony of Polybius, that galleys of a still larger size had been constructed in the Punic wars Since the establishment of the Roman empire over the Mediterranean the useless art of building large ships of war had probably been neglected and at length forgotten

38 Chishull (Travels p 61-63 72-76) proceeded from Gallipoli through Hadrianople in the Danube in about fifteen days He was in the train of an English ambassador whose baggage consisted of seventy-one waggons That learned traveller has the merit of tracing a curious and unfrequented route

39 The narrative of Zosimus who actually leads Gainas beyond the Danube must be corrected by the testimony of Socrates (l. vi c. 6) and Sozomen (l. viii c. 4) that he was killed in Thrace and by the precise and authentic dates of the Alexandrian or Paschal Chronicle p 307 [ed. Paris tom i p 567 ed. Bonn] The naval victory of the Hellespont is fixed to the month Apellæus the tenth of the calends of January (December 23) the head of Gainas was brought to Constantinople the third of the nones of January (January 3) in the month Audynæus

40 Eusebius Scholasticus acquired much fame by his poem on the Gothic war in which he had served Near forty years afterwards Ammonius recited another poem on the same subject, in the presence of the emperor Theodosius See Socrates l. vi c. 6

41 The sixth book of Socrates the eighth of Sozomen and the fifth of Theodoret afford curious and authentic materials for the Life of John Chrysostom Besides those general historians I have taken for my guides the four principal biographers of the saint — 1 The author of a partial and passionate Vindication of the Archbishop of Constantinople composed in the form of a dialogue and under the name of his zealous partisan Palladius bishop of Helenopolis (Tillemont Mém. Ecclésiast. tom xi p 500-533) It is inserted among the works of Chrysostom tom xiii p 1-90 edit. Montfaucon 2 The moderate Erasmus (tom. iii. Epist. mci. p 1331-1347 edit. Lugd. Bat.) His vivacity and good sense were his own his errors in the uncultivated state of ecclesiastical antiquity were almost inevitable 3 The learned Tillemont (Mém. Ecclésiastiques tom xi p 1-405 547-6 &c etc etc) who compiles the Lives of the saints with incredible patience and religious accuracy He has minutely searched the voluminous works of Chrysostom himself 4 Father Montfaucon who has perused those works with the curious diligence of an editor discovered several new homilies and again reviewed and composed the Life of Chrysostom (Opera Chrysostomi tom xiii p 91-177)

42 As I am almost a stranger to the voluminous sermons of Chrysostom I have given my confidence to the two most judicious and moderate of the ecclesiastical critics, Erasmus (tom iii p 1344) and Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclesiastique, tom iii p 38), yet the good taste of the former is sometimes vitiated by an excessive love of antiquity, and the good sense of the latter is always restrained by prudential considerations

43 The females of Constantinople distinguished themselves by their enmity or their attachment to Chrysostom Three noble and opulent widows—Marsa, Castricia, and Eugraphia—were the leaders of the persecution (Pallad Dialog tom xii p 14 [c 4, p 35, ed Paris, 1680]) It was impossible that they should forgive a preacher who reproached their affectation to conceal, by the ornaments of dress, their age and ugliness (Pallad p 27) Olympias, by equal zeal, displayed in a more pious cause, has obtained the title of saint See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xi p 416–440

44 Sozomen, and more especially Socrates, have defined the real character of Chrysostom with a temperate and impartial freedom very offensive to his blind admirers Those historians lived in the next generation, when party violence was abated, and had conversed with many persons intimately acquainted with the virtues and imperfections of the saint

45 Palladius (tom xiii p 40, etc [c xii p 102, ed Paris, 1680]) very seriously defends the archbishop 1 He never tasted wine 2 The weakness of his stomach required a peculiar diet 3 Business, or study, or devotion, often kept him fasting till sunset 4 He detested the noise and levity of great dinners 5 He saved the expense for the use of the poor 6 He was apprehensive, in a capital like Constantinople, of the envy and reproach of partial invitations

46 Chrysostom declares his free opinion (tom ix, hom iii in Act Apostol p 29) that the number of bishops who might be saved bore a very small proportion to those who would be damned

47 See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xi p 441–500

48 I have purposely omitted the controversy which arose among the monks of Egypt concerning Origenism and Anthropomorphism, the dissimulation and violence of Theophilus, his artful management of the simplicity of Epiphanius the persecution and flight of the long or tall brothers, the ambiguous support which they received at Constantinople from Chrysostom, etc. etc.

49 Photius (p 53–60 [p 17, 199 ed Bekk]) has preserved the original acts of the synod of the Oak, which destroy the false assertion that Chrysostom was condemned by no more than thirty six bishops of whom twenty nine were Egyptians Forty five bishops subscribed his sentence See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xi p 595

50 Palladius owns (p 30 [c 8 p 75]) that if the people of Constantinople had found Theophilus they would certainly have thrown him into the sea Socrates mentions (l vi c 17) a battle between the mob and the sailors of Alexandria, in which many wounds were given, and some lives were lost The massacre of the monks is observed only by the Pagan Zosimus (l v [c 23] p 324), who acknowledges that Chrysostom had a singular talent to lead the illiterate multitude, ἦν γὰρ ὁ ἀνθρώπος ἀλογον ὄχλον υπαγαγεσθαι δυνάς

51 See Socrates, l vi c 18 Sozomen, l viii c 20 Zosimus (l v [c 24] p 324, 327) mentions, in general terms, his invectives against Eudoxia The homily which begins with those famous words is rejected as spurious Montfaucon, tom xii p 151 Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xi p 603

52 We might naturally expect such a charge from Zosimus (l v [c 24] p 327, but it is remarkable enough that it should be confirmed by Socrates, l vi c 18, and the Paschal Chronicle, p 307 [ed Paris, tom i p 568, ed Bonn]

53 He displays those specious motives (Post Reditum, c 13, 14) in the language of an orator and a politician

54 Two hundred and forty-two of the epistles of Chrysostom are still extant (Opera, tom iii p 528–736 [ed Bened]) They are addressed to a great variety of persons, and show a firmness of mind much superior to that of Cicero in his exile The fourteenth epistle contains a curious narrative of the dangers of his journey

55 After the exile of Chrysostom, Theophilus published an enormous and horrible volume against him, in which he perpetually repeats the polite expressions of hostem humanitatis, sacrilegorum principem, immundum dæmonem, he affirms that John Chrysostom had delivered his soul to be adulterated by the devil, and wishes that some farther punishment, adequate (if possible) to the magnitude of his crimes, may be inflicted on him St Jerom, at the request of his friend Theophilus, translated this edifying performance from Greek into Latin See Facundus Hermian Defens pro iii Capitul l vi c 5 [p 260, ed Paris, 1629], published by Sirmond, Opera, tom ii p 595, 596 597

56 His name was inserted by his successor Atticus in the dyptics of the church of Constantinople, A D 418 Ten years afterwards he was revered as a saint Cyril, who inherited the place and the passions of his uncle Theophilus, yielded with much reluctance See Facund Hermian l vi c 1 [p 142, ed Par 1629] Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom xiv p 277–283

57 Socrates l viii c 45 Theodoret l v c 36 This event reconciled the Joannites who had hitherto refused to acknowledge his successors During his lifetime the Joannites were respected by the catholics as the true and orthodox communion of Constantinople Their obstinacy gradually drove them to the brink of schism

58 According to some accounts (Baronius Ann Ecclés A D 438 No 9 10) the emperor was forced to send a letter of invitation and exhortation before the body of the venerated saint could be moved from Comana

59 Zosimus I v [c 18] p 315 The chastity of an empress should not be impeached without producing a witness but it is astonishing that the witness should write and live under a prince whose legitimacy he dared to attack. We must suppose that this history was a party libel privately read and circulated by the Pagans. Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom v p 782) is not averse to brand the reputation of Eudocia.

60 Porphyry of Gaza. His zeal was transported by the order which he had obtained for the destruction of eight Pagan temples of that city. See the curious details of his life (Baronius A.D. 401 No 17-51) originally written in Greek or perhaps in Syriac by a monk one of his favourite deacons.

61 Philostorgius I xi c 11 and Godefroy Dissertat p 457.

62 Jerom (tom vi p 73 76) describes in lively colours the regular and destructive march of the locusts which spread a dark cloud between heaven and earth over the land of Palestine. Seasonable winds scattered them partly into the Dead Sea and partly into the Mediterranean.

63 Procopius de Bell. Persic. I i c 2 p 8 edit Louvre (tom I p 14 ed Bonn).

64 Agathias I vi. [c 26] p 136 137 [p 264 ed Bonn]. Although he confesses the prevalence of the tradition he asserts that Procopius was the first who had committed it to writing. Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 397) argues very sensibly on the merits of this fable. His criticism was not warped by any ecclesiastical authority both Procopius and Agathias are half Pagans.

65 Socrates I vii c. 1 Anthemius was the grandson of Philip one of the ministers of Constantius and the grandfather of the emperor Anthemius. After his return from the Persian embassy he was appointed consul and Praetorian prefect of the East in the year 403 and held the praefecture about ten years. See his honours and praises in Godefroy Cod Theod tom vi p 350 Tillemont Hist des Emp tom vi p 1 etc.

66 Sozomen I ix c 5. He saw some Scyri at work near Mount Olympus in Bithynia and cherished the vain hope that those captives were the last of the nation.

67 Cod Theod I vii tit xvii I xv tit 1 leg 49.

68 Sozomen has filled three chapters with a magnificent panegyric of Pulcheria (I ix c 1 3) and Tillemont (Mémoires Ecclésiastiques tom xv p 171-184) has dedicated a separate article to the honour of St Pulcheria virgin and empress.

69 Suidas (Excerpta p 68 in Script Byzant) pretends on the credit of the Nestorians that Pulcheria was exasperated against their founder because he censured her connection with the beautiful Paulinus and her incest with her brother Theodosius.

70 See Ducange Famil Byzantin p 70 Flaccilla the eldest daughter either died before Arcadius or if she lived till the year 431 (Marcellin Chron.) some defect of mind or body must have excluded her from the honours of her rank.

71 She was admonished by repeated dreams of the place where the relics of the forty martyrs had been buried. The ground had successively belonged to the house and garden of a woman of Constantinople to a monastery of Macedonian monks and to a church of St Thyrus erected by Cæsarius who was consul A.D. 397 and the memory of the relics was almost obliterated. Notwithstanding the charitable wishes of Dr Jortin (Remarks tom iv p 234) it is not easy to acquit Pulcheria of some share in the pious fraud which must have been transacted when she was more than five and thirty years of age.

72 There is a remarkable difference between the two ecclesiastical historians who in general bear so close a resemblance. Sozomen (I ix c 1) ascribes to Pulcheria the government of the empire and the education of her brother whom he scarcely condescends to praise. Socrates though he affectedly disclaims all hopes of favour or fame, composes an elaborate panegyric on the emperor and cautiously suppresses the merits of his sister (I vii c. 22 42). Philostorgius (I xii c 7) expresses the influence of Pulcheria in gentle and courtly language τὰς βασιλῆς δὲ συμπαροῦς ἐπηγεροῦ μὲν καὶ δικαίου οὐρα. Suidas (Excerpt p 53) gives a true character of Theodosius and I have followed the example of Tillemont (tom vi. p 25) in borrowing some strokes from the modern Greeks.

73 Theodoret I v c 37. The bishop of Cyrrhus, one of the first men of his age for his learning and piety, applauds the obedience of Theodosius to the divine laws.

74 Socrates (I vii c. 21) mentions her name (Athenais the daughter of Leontius an Athenian sophist) her baptism marriage and poetical genius. The most ancient account of her history is in John Malala (part II p 20 21 edit Venet 1733 [p 354 355 ed Bonn]) and in the Passchal Chronicle (p 311 312 [ed Paris tom I p 576 577 ed Bonn]). Those authors had probably seen original pictures of the empress Eudocia. The modern Greeks Zonaras Cedrenus etc have displayed the love rather than the talent of fiction. From Nicephorus indeed I have ventured to assume her age. The writer of a romance would not have imagined that Athenais was near twenty eight years old when she inflamed the heart of a young emperor.

75 Socrates I vii c 21 Photius p 413-420 [p 128 129 ed Bekk]. The Homeric cento is still extant and has been repeatedly printed but the claim of Eudocia to that insipid performance is disputed by the critics. See Fabricius Biblioth Græc tom I p 357. The Ionia a miscellaneous dictionary of history and fable was compiled by another empress of the name of Eudocia who lived in the eleventh century and the work is still extant in manuscript.

76 Baronius (Annal Eccles A.D. 438 439) is copious and florid, but he is accused of placing the lies of different ages on the same level of authenticity

77 In this short view of the disgrace of Eudocia I have imitated the caution of Evagrius (I i c 21) and Count Marcellinus (in Chron A D 440 and 441 [p 26]) The two authentic dates assigned by the latter overturn a great part of the Greek fictions and the celebrated story of the apple, etc., is fit only for the Arabian Nights, where something not very unlike it may be found

78 Priscus (in Excerpt Legat p 69 [ed Paris, p 208, ed Bonn]), a contemporary and a courtier, only mentions her Pagan and Christian names without adding any title of honour or respect

79 For the two pilgrimages of Eudocia, and her long residence at Jerusalem, her devotion, alms, etc., see Socrates (I vii c 47) and Evagrius (I i c 20, 21, 22) The Paschal Chronicle may sometimes deserve regard, and, in the domestic history of Artioch, John Malala becomes a writer of good authority The Abbé Guenée, in a memoir on the fertility of Palestine, of which I have only seen an extract, calculates the gifts of Eudocia at 20,488 pounds of gold, above 800,000 pounds sterling

80 Theodoret, I v c 39 Tillemont, Mem Eccl's tom xii p 356-364 Assemani, Biblioth Oriental tom iii p 396, tom iv p 61 Theodoret blames the rashness of Abdas, but extols the constancy of his martyrdom Yet I do not clearly understand the casuistry which prohibits our repairing the damage which we have unlawfully committed

81 Socrates (I vii c 18, 19, 20, 21) is the best author for the Persian war We may likewise consult the three Chronicles, the Paschal, and those of Marcellinus and Malala

82 This account of the ruin and division of the kingdom of Armenia is taken from the third book of the Armenian history of Moses of Chorene Deficient as he is in every qualification of a good historian his local information, his passions, and his prejudices are strongly expressive of a native and contemporary Procopius (de Edificiis, I iii c

1-5) relates the same facts in a very different manner, but I have extracted the circumstances, the most probable in themselves and the least inconsistent with Moses of Chorene

83 The western Armenians used the Greek language and characters in their religious offices, but the use of that hostile tongue was prohibited by the Persians in the eastern provinces, which were obliged to use the Syriac, till the invention of the Armenian letters by Mesrobes in the beginning of the fifth century, and the subsequent version of the Bible into the Armenian language an event which relaxed the connection of the church and nation with Constantinople

84 Moses Choren I iii c 59, p 309 and p 358 [ed Whiston, Lond 1736] Procopius, de Edificiis, I iii c 5 Theodosiopolis stands, or rather stood, about thirty-five miles to the east of Arzeroum, the modern capital of Turkish Armenia See D'Anville, Géographie Ancienne, tom ii p 99, 100

85 Moses Choren I iii c 63, p 316 According to the institution of St Gregory, the Apostle of Armenia, the archbishop was always of the royal family, a circumstance which, in some degree, corrected the influence of the sacerdotal character, and united the mitre with the crown

86 A branch of the royal house of Arsaces still subsisted with the rank and possessions (as it should seem) of Armenian satraps See Moses Choren I iii c 65, p 321

87 Valarsaces was appointed king of Armenia by his brother the Parthian monarch immediately after the defeat of Antiochus Sidetes (Moses Choren I ii c 2, p 85), one hundred and thirty years before Christ Without depending on the various and contradictory periods of the reigns of the last kings we may be assured that the ruin of the Armenian kingdom happened after the council of Chalcedon, A D 451 (L iii c 61, p 312), and under Varanes, or Bahram, king of Persia (I iii c 64, p 317) who reigned from A D 420 to 440 See Assemani Biblioth Oriental tom iii p 396

Chapter XXXIII

1 Τὰ σινεχὰ κατὰ στόμα φίληματα is the expression of Olympiodorus (apud Photium, p 196 [p 62 b, ed Bekk]), who means, perhaps to describe the same caresses which Mahomet bestowed on his daughter Phatemah Qurando (says the Prophet himself), quando subit mihi desiderium Pa'alul, oculor eam et ingero linguam meum in os ejus But this sensual indulgence was justified by miracle and mystery and the anecdote has been communicated to the public by the Reverend Father Maracci, in his Version and Confutation of the Koran, tom i p 92

* For these revolutions of the Western empire

consult Olympiodorus apud Phot p 192, 193 196 197 200 [p 61-63 ed Bekk] Sozomen, I ix c 16 Socrates I vii 23 24 Philostorgius I xii c 10, 11 [12-14] and Godefroy, Desertat p 486 Procopius de Bell Vandal I i c 3 p 187, 183 [ed Paris tom i p 319 1897 ed Bonn], Theophanes in Chronograph p 72, 73 [ed Paris tom i p 120-131, ed Bonn] and the Chronicle

3 See Crotius de Jure Belli et Pacis I ii c 7 He has laboriously, but vainly, attempted to form a reasonable system of jurisprudence from the various and discordant modes of royal execution which have been introduced by fraud or force by time or accident

4. The original writers are not agreed (see Muratori Annali d'Italia tom iv p 139) whether Valentinian received the Imperial diadem at Rome or Ravenna. In this uncertainty I am willing to believe that some respect was shown to the senate

5 The Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l'Europe tom vii p 292-300) has established the reality explained the motives and traced the consequences of this remarkable cession

¶ See the first Novel of Theodosius by which he ratifies and communicates (A D 438) the Theodosian Code. About 40 years before that time the unity of legislation had been proved by an exception. The Jews who were numerous in the cities of Apulia and Calabria produced a law of the East to justify their exemption from municipal offices (Cod Theod l xvi tit viii leg 13) and the Western emperor was obliged to invalidate by a special edict the law quam constat meis partibus esse damnosam Cod. Theod l xi [xii] tit i leg 158

7 Cassiodorus (Variar l xi Epist 1 p 238 [p 161 ed Venet]) has compared the regencies of Placidia and Amalasuntha. He arraigns the weakness of the mother of Valentinian and praises the virtues of his royal mistress. On this occasion flattery seems to have spoken the language of truth

8 Philostorgius l xii c 12 [14] and Godefroy's Dissertation ¶ 493 etc and Renatus Gringorius apud Gregor Turon l ii § 8 in tom ii p 163. The father of Aetius was Gaudentinus an illustrious citizen of the province of Scythia and master general of the cavalry his mother was a rich and noble Italian. From his earliest youth Aetius as a soldier and a hostage had conversed with the barbarians

9 For the character of Boniface see Olympiodorus apud Phot ¶ 196 [p 62 B ed Bekk] and St Augustin apud Tillemont Mémoires Ecclésiastiques tom xiii p 712-715 886. The bishop of Hippo at length deplored the fall of his friend who after a solemn vow of chastity had married a second wife of the Arian sect and who was suspected of keeping several concubines in his house

10 Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c 3 4 p 182-186 [tom i p 319-328 ed Bonn]) relates the fraud of Aetius the revolt of Boniface and the loss of Africa. This anecdote which is supported by some collateral testimony (see Ruinart Hist Persecut Vandal p 420 421) seems agreeable to the practice of ancient and modern courts and would be naturally revealed by the repentance of Boniface

11 See the Chronicles of Prosper and Idatius [Sirmond Op tom ii p 298] Salvian (de Gubernat Dei l vii p 246 Paris 1608) ascribes the victory of the Vandals to their superior piety. They fasted they prayed they carried a Bible in the front of the Host with the design perhaps of reproaching the perfidy and sacrilege of their enemies

12 Gizericus (his name is variously expressed) staturâ mediocris et equi casû claudicans animo profundus sermone rarus luxuriæ contemptor irâ turbidus habendi cupidus ad sollicitandas gentes providentissimus semina contentionum jacere odia miscere paratus Jornandes de Rebus Geticis c 33 p 675. This portrait which is drawn with some skill and a strong likeness must have been copied from the Gothic history of Cassiodorus

13 See the Chronicle of Idatius. That bishop a Spaniard and a contemporary places the passage of the Vandals in the month of May of the year of Abraham (which commences in October) 2444. This date which coincides with A D 429, is confirmed by Isidore another Spanish bishop and is justly preferred to the opinion of those writers who have marked for that event one of the two preceding years. See Pagi Critica tom ii p 205 etc

14 Compare Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c 5 p 190 [tom i p 334 ed Bonn]) and Victor Vitensis (de Persecutione Vandal l i c 1 p 3 edit. Ruinart). We are assured by Idatius that Genseric evacuated Spain cum Vandalis omnibus eorumque familiis [Sirmond Op tom ii p 299] and Posidonius (in Vit Augustin § 28 apud Ruinart p 427) describes his army as manus ingens immanium gentium Vandalorum et Alanorum commixtam seculum habens Gothorum gentem aliarumque diversarum personas

15 For the manners of the Moors see Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c 6 p 249 [tom i p 434 ed Bonn]) for their figure and complexion M de Buffon (Histoire Naturelle tom iii p 430) Procopius says in general that the Moors had joined the Vandals before the death of Valentinian (de Bell Vandal l i c 5 p 190 [tom i p 334 ed Bonn]) and it is probable that the independent tribes did not embrace any uniform system of policy

16 See Tillemont Mémoires Ecclésiastiques tom xiii p 316-338 and the whole series of the persecution in the original monuments published by Dupin at the end of Optatus p 323-515

17 The Donatist bishops at the conference of Carthage amounted to 279 and they asserted that their whole number was not less than 400. The Catholics had 286 present 120 absent besides sixty four vacant bishoprics

18 The fifth title of the sixteenth book of the Theodosian Code exhibits a series of the Imperial laws against the Donatists from the year 400 to the year 428. Of these the 54th law promulgated by Honorius A D 414 is the most severe and effectual

19 St Augustin altered his opinion with regard to the proper treatment of heretics. His pathetic declaration of pity and indulgence for the Manichæans has been inserted by Mr Locke (vol iii p 469) among the choice specimens of his common place book. Another philosopher the celebrated Bayle (tom ii p 445-496) has refused, with superfluous dilgence and ingenuity the arguments

by which the bishop of Hippo justified, in his old age, the persecution of the Donatists

20 See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xiii p 586-592, 806 The Donatists boasted of thousands of these voluntary martyrs Augustin asserts, and probably with truth, that these numbers were much exaggerated, but he sternly maintains that it was better that some should burn themselves in this world than that all should burn in hell flames

21 According to St Augustin and Theodoret, the Donatists were inclined to the principles, or at least to the party, of the Arians, which Genseric supported Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom vi p 68

22 See Baronius, Annal Ecclés A U 428, No 7, A D 439, No 35 The cardinal, though more inclined to seek the cause of great events in heaven than on the earth, has observed the apparent connection of the Vandals and the Donatists Under the reign of the barbarians, the schismatics of Africa enjoyed an obscure peace of one hundred years, at the end of which we may again trace them by the light of the Imperial persecutions See Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom vi p 192, etc

23 In a confidential letter to Count Boniface, St Augustin, without examining the grounds of the quarrel, piously exhorts him to discharge the duties of a Christian and a subject, to extricate himself without delay from his dangerous and guilty situation, and even, if he could obtain the consent of his wife, to embrace a life of celibacy and penance (Tillemont, Mém Ecclés tom xiii p 890) The bishop was intimately connected with Darius, the minister of peace (id tom viii p 928)

24 The original complaints of the desolation of Africa are contained—1 In a letter from Capreolus, bishop of Carthage, to excuse his absence from the council of Ephesus (ap Ruinart, p 428) 2 In the Life of St Augustin by his friend and col 3 In the league Possidius (ap Ruinart, p 427) 3 In the History of the Vandalic Persecution, by Victor Vitensis (l i c 1, 2, 3, edit Ruinart) The last picture, which was drawn sixty years after the event, is more expressive of the author's passions than of the truth of facts

25 See Cellarius, Geograph Antiq tom ii part ii p 112 Leo African in Ramusio, tom i fol 70 L'Afrique de Marmol, tom ii p 434 437 Shaw's Travels, p 46, 47 The old Hippo Rerius was finally destroyed by the Arabs in the seventh century but a new town, at the distance of two miles, was built with the materials, and it continued in the sixteenth century about three hundred families of industrious, but turbulent, manufacturers The adjacent territory is renowned for a pure air, a fertile soil, and plenty of exquisite fruits

26 The Life of St Augustin, by Tillemont fills a quarto volume (Mém Ecclés tom xiii) of more than one thousand pages and the diligence of that learned Jansenist was excited on this occasion by pious and devout zeal for the founder of his sect

27 Such at least is the account of Victor Vitensis (de Persecut Vandal l i c 3) though

Gennadius seems to doubt whether any person had read, or even collected, all the works of St Augustin (see Hieronym Opera, tom i p 319, in Catalog Scriptor Ecclés) They have been repeatedly printed, and Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclés tom iii p 158-257) has given a large and satisfactory abstract of them as they stand in the last edition of the Benedictines My personal acquaintance with the bishop of Hippo does not extend beyond the Confessions and the City of God

28 In his early youth (Confess i 23) St Augustin disliked and neglected the study of Greek, and he frankly owns that he read the Platonists in a Latin version (Confess vii 13) Some modern critics have thought that his ignorance of Greek disqualified him from expounding the Scriptures, and Cicero or Quintilian would have required the knowledge of that language in a professor of rhetoric

29 These questions were seldom agitated from the time of St Paul to that of St Augustin I am informed that the Greek fathers maintain the natural sentiments of the Semi-Pelagians, and that the orthodoxy of St Augustin was derived from the Manichæan school

30 The church of Rome has canonised Augustin and reprobated Calvin Yet, as the real difference between them is invisible even to a theological microscope, the Molinists are oppressed by the authority of the saint, and the Jansenists are disgraced by their resemblance to the heretic In the meanwhile the Protestant Arminians stand aloof and deride the mutual perplexity of the disputants (see a curious Review of the Controversy by Le Clerc, Bibliothèque Universelle, tom xiv p 144-398) Perhaps a reasoner still more independent may smile in his turn when he peruses an Arminian Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans

31 Ducange, Sam Byzant p 67 On one side, the head of Valentinian on the reverse, Boniface with a scourge in one hand and a palm in the other, standing in a triumphal car, which is drawn by four horses, or, in another medal, by four stags, an unlucky emblem! I should doubt whether another example can be found of the head of a subject on the reverse of an Imperial medal See Science des Médailles, by the Père Jobert tom i p 132-150, edit of 1739, by the Baron de la Harpe

32 Procopius (de Bell Vandal l i c 3 p 185 [tom i p 325, ed Bonn]) continues the history of Boniface no further than his return to Italy His death is mentioned by Prosper [Ann 437] and Marcellinus the expression of the latter that Aëtius the day before had provided him self with a lancea spear implies something like a regular duel

33 See Procopius de Bell Vandal l i c 4 p 186 [tom i p 327, ed Bonn] Valentinian published several humane laws to relieve the distress of his Arian subjects in I Mountainian subjects he discharged them in a great measure from the payment of their debt reduced their tribute to one eighth and gave them a right of appeal from it

34 Victor Vitensis de Persecut Vandal I i c
5 p 26 The cruelties of Genseric towards his subjects are strongly expressed in Prosper's Chronicle
A D 442

35 Possidius in Vit Augustin c. 28 apud
Ruinar p 428

36 See the Chronicles of Idatius Isidore Prosper and Marcellinus They mark the same year but different days for the surprisal of Carthage

37 The picture of Carthage as it flourished in the fourth and fifth centuries is taken from the Expositio totius Mundi p 17 18 in the third volume of Hudson's Minor Geographers from Ausonius de Claris Urbibus p 228 229 and principally from Salviat de Gubernatione Dei I vii p 257 258 I am surpris'd that the Astilia should not place either a mint or an arsenal at Carthage but only a gynæceum or female manufacture

38 The anonymous author of the Expositio
totius Mundi compares in his barbarous Latin the country and the inhabitants and after stigmatising their want of faith he coolly concludes Difficile autem inter eos invenitur bonus tamen
in multis pauci boni esse possunt P 18

39 He declares that the peculiar vices of each country were collected in the sink of Carthage (I vi p 257) In the indulgence of vice the Africans applauded their manly virtue Et illi se magis viris fortitudinis esse crederent qui maxime viros femine: usûs probrositate fregissent (p 268) The streets of Carthage were polluted by effeminate wretches who publicly assumed the countenance the dress and the character of women (p 264) If a monk appeared in the city the holy man was pursued with impious scorn and ridicule detestan-tibus ridendum cachinnis (p 289)

40 Compare Procopius de Bell Vandal I i c 5 p 189 190 [tom I p 332 399 ed Bonn] and
Victor Vitensis de Persecut Vandal I i c 4

41 Ruinar (p 444-457) has collected from Theodoret and other authors the misfortunes real and fabulous of the inhabitants of Carthage

42 The choice of fabulous circumstances is of small importance yet I have confined myself to the narrative which was translated from the Syriac by the care of G egory of Tours (de Gloriâ Mar-tyrûm I i p 95 in Max Bibliothecâ Patrum tom xi p 856) to the Greek acts of their martyrdom (apud Photius p 1400 1401 [p 467 ed Bekk]) and to the Annals of the Patriarch Eu-tychius (tom I p 391 531 532 535 vers Pocock [Oxon 1658])

43 Two Syriac writers as they are quoted by Assemani (Bibliot Oriental tom I p 336 338) place the resurrection of the Seven Sleepers in the year 736 (A D 425) or 748 (A D 437) of the era of the Seleucides Their Greek acts which Photius had read assign the date of the thirty-eighth year of the reign of Theodosius which may coincide either with A M 439 or 446 The period which had elapsed since the persecution of Decius is easily ascertained and nothing less than the ignorance of Mahomet or the legendaries could suppose an interval of three or four hundred years

44 James one of the orthodox fathers of the Syrian church was born A D 452 he began to compose his sermons A D 474 he was made bishop of Batnæ in the district of Sarug and province of Mesopotamia A D 510 and died A D 521 (Assemani tom I p 288 289) For the homily de Purris Ephesus see p 335-339 though I could wish that Assemani had translated the text of James of Sarug instead of answering the objections of Baronius

45 See the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists (Mensis Julii tom vi p 375-397) This immense calendar of Saints in one hundred and twenty-six years (1644-1770) and in fifty volumes in folio has advanced no farther than the 7th day of October The suppression of the Jesuits has most probably checked an undertaking which through the medium of fable and superstition communicates much historical and philosophical instruction

46 See Maracci Alcoran Sura xviii tom I p 420-427 and tom I part IV p 103 With such an ample privilege Mahomet has not shown much taste or ingenuity He has invented the doo' (Al Rakim) of the Seven Sleepers the respect of the sun who altered his course twice a day that he might not shine into the cavern and the care of God himself who preserved their bodies from pu-trefaction by turning them to the right and left

47 See D Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale p
139 and Renaudot Hist Patriarch Alexandrin
p 39 40

48 Paul the deacon of Aquileia (de Gestis Langobardorum I i c 4 p 743 746 edit Grot) who lived towards the end of the eighth century has placed in a cavern under a rock on the shore of the ocean the Seven Sleepers of the North whose long repose was respected by the barbarians Their dress declared them to be Romans and the deacon conjectures that they were reserved by Providence as the future apostles of those unbelieving countries

Chapter XXXIV

1 The authentic materials for the history of Attila may be found in Jornandes (de Rebus Geticis, c 34-50, p 660-688, edit Grot) and Priscus (Excerpta de Legationibus, p 33-76, Paris, 1648 [p 140-220, ed Bonn]) I have not seen the Lives of Attila, composed by Juvencus Caelius Calanus Dalmatinus, in the twelfth century, or by Nicolas Olahus, archbishop of Gran, in the sixteenth See Mascou's History of the Germans, iv 23, and Maffei Osservazioni Letterarie, tom 1 p 88, 89 Whatever the modern Hungarians have added must be fabulous, and they do not seem to have excelled in the art of fiction They suppose that when Attila invaded Gaul and Italy, married innumerable wives, etc, he was one hundred and twenty years of age Thevroc Chron p 1 c 22, in Script Hungar tom 1 p 76

2 Hungary has been successively occupied by three Scythian colonies — 1 The Huns of Attila, 2 The Abares, in the sixth century, and, 3 The Turks or Magyars, A D 889, the immediate and genuine ancestors of the modern Hungarians, whose connection with the two former is extremely faint and remote The Prodromus and Notitia of Matthew Belius appear to contain a rich fund of information concerning ancient and modern Hungary I have seen the extracts in Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne, tom xii p 1-51, and Bibliothèque Raisonnée, tom xvi p 127-175

3 Socrates, l vi c 43, Theodoret, l v c 37 Tillemont, who always depends on the faith of his ecclesiastical authors, strenuously contends (Hist des Emp tom vi p 136, 607) that the wars and personages were not the same

4 See Priscus, p 47, 48 [ed Par, pp 166-170, ed Bonn], and Hist des Peuples de l'Europe, tom vii c xii xiii xiv xi

5 Priscus, p 39 [p 150, ed Bonn] The modern Hungarians have deduced his genealogy, which ascends, in the thirty fifth degree, to Ham the son of Noah, yet they are ignorant of his father's real name. (De Guignes, Hist des Huns, tom ii p 297)

6 Compare Jornandes (c 35 p 661) with Buffon, Hist Naturelle, tom iii p 380 The former had a right to observe origins sur signa restituta The character and portrait of Attila are probably transcribed from Cassiodorus

Oxon 1663] Genealogical History of the Tartars, by Abulghazi Bahader Khan, part iii c 15 part ii c 3, Vie de Gengiscan par Petit de la Croix, l i c 1, 6 The relations of the missionaries who visited Tartary in the thirteenth century (see the twelfth volume of the Histoire des Voyages) extracted from the popular language and opinions Zingis is styled the son of God, etc etc

8. Nec templum apud eos vultur, aut de ubrum,

9 Priscus relates this remarkable story, both in his own text (p 65 [p 201, ed Bonn]) and in the quotation made by Jornandes (c 35, p 662) He might have explained the tradition or fable, which characterised this famous sword, and the name as well as attributes of the Scythian deity whom he has translated into the Mars of the Greeks and Romans

10 Herodot l iv c 62 For the sake of economy, I have calculated by the smallest stadium In the human sacrifices they cut off the shoulder and arm of the victim, which they threw up into the air, and drew omens and presages from the manner of their falling on the pile

11 Priscus, p 55 [p 182, ed Bonn] A more civilised hero, Augustus himself, was pleased if the person on whom he fixed his eyes seemed unable to support their divine lustre Sueton in August c 79

12 The Count de Burt (Hist des Peuples de l'Europe, tom vii p 428, 429) attempts to clear Attila from the murder of his brother, and is almost inclined to reject the concurrent testimony of Jornandes and the contemporary Chronicles

13 Fortissimum gentium dominus, qui intra dicta antea potentia, solus Scythia et Germanica regna possedit Jornandes, c 49 p 684 Priscus, p 64, 65 [p 199-201, ed Bonn] M de Guignes by his knowledge of the Chinese, has acquired (tom ii p 295-301) an adequate idea of the empire of Attila

14 See Hist des Huns tom ii p 295 The Geougen believed that the Huns could excite at pleasure storms of wind and rain This phenomenon was produced by the stone Giza to whose magic power the loss of a battle was ascribed by the Mahometan Tartars of the fourteenth century See Cherefeddin Ali Hist de Timur Bec, tom i p 82, 83

15 Jornandes = 35 p 661, c 37 p 667 See Tillemont, Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 120 138 Corneille has represented the pride of Attila in his subject lines and his tragedy opens with these two ridiculous lines —

Ils ne sont pas venus nos deux rois qu'on leur dit

Qu'ils se sont trop attendus et qu'Attila est venu

The two lines of the Cépide and the Orontides are profound politicians and immortal lovers and the whole piece exhibits the defects, II - penes, of the poet

19 Priscus p 331 His history contained a copious and elegant account of the war (Evagrius l i 17) but the extracts which relate to the em- bassies are the only parts that have reached our times The original work was accessible however the writers from whom we borrow our imper- fect knowledge Jornandes Theophanes Count Marcellinus Prosper Tyro and the author of the Alexandrian or Paschal Chronicle M de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l Europe tom vii c xv) has examined the cause the circumstances and the duration of this war and will not allow it to extend beyond the year four hundred and forty four

20 Procopius de Edificiis, l iv c 5 [tom iii p 286 ed Bonn] These fortres were afterwards restored strengthened and enlarged by the emperor Justinian but they were soon destroyed by the Abares who succeeded to the power and pos- sessions of the Huns

21 Septuaginta civitates (says Prosper Tyro) de- prædatione vastatæ The language of Count Mar- cellinus is still more forcible Pene totam Europam invasit ex his igitur civitatibus atque castellis contraxit

22 Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 106 107) has paid great attention to this mem- orable earthquake which was felt as far from Con- stantinople as Antioch and Alexandria and is celebrated by all the ecclesiastical writers In the hands of a popular preacher an earthquake is an engine of admirable effect

23 He represented to the emperor of the Mo- guls that the four provinces (Petcheli Chantong Chansi and Leaotong) which he already possessed might annually produce under a mild administra- tion 500 000 ounces of silver 400 000 measures of rice and 800 000 pieces of silk Gaubil Hist de la Dynastie des Mongous p 58 59 Yelutchouay

26 Cherefeddin Ali huservilepanegyrist would afford us many horrid examples In his camp be- fore Delhi Timur massacred 100 000 Indian pris- oners who had smiled when the army of their countrymen appeared in sight (Hist de Timur Bec, tom iii p 90) The people of Ispahan sup- plied 70 000 human skulls for the structure of sev- eral lofty towers (id tom i p 434) A similar tax was levied on the revolt of Bagdad (tom iii 370) and the exact account which Cher feddin was not able to procure from the proper officers is stated by another historian (Ahmed Arabssada tom ii p 175 vers Manger) at 90 000 heads

27 The ancients Jornandes Priscus etc are ignorant of this epithet The modern Hungarians have imagined that it was applied by a herald of Gaul to Attila who was pleased to insert it among the titles of his royal dignity Mascoi ix 23 and Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom vi 143

28 The missionaries of St Chrysostom had con- verted great numbers of the Scythians who dwelt beyond the Danube in tents and waggons Theo- doret l v c 31 Photius p 1517 [p 508 b ed Bekk] The Mahometans the Nestorians and the Latin Christians thought themselves secure of gaining the sons and grandsons of Zungus who treated the rival missionaries with impartial favour

29 The Germans who exterminated Varus and his legions had been particularly offended with the Roman laws and lawyers One of the bar- barians after the effectual precautions of cutting out the tongue of an advocate and sewing up his mouth observed with much satisfaction that the viper could no long r hiss Florus iv 12

30 Priscus p 59 [p 190 ed Bonn] It should seem that the Huns preferred the Gothic and Latin languages to their own which was probably a harsh and barren idiom

31 Philip de Comines in his admirable picture of the last moments of Lewis XI (Mémoires l vi c 12) represents the insolence of his physician who in five months extorted 54 000 crowns and a rich bishopric from the stern avaricious tyrant

32 Priscus (p 61 [p 194 ed Bonn]) extols the equity of the Roman laws which protected the life of a slave Occidere solent (says Tacitus of the Germans) non discipula et servitate sed impetu et ira ut inimicum nisi quod impune De Moribus Germ c 25 The Heruli who were the subjects of Attila, claimed and exercised the power of life and death over their slaves. See a remarkable instance in the second book of Agathias.

33 See the whole conversation in Priscus, p. 59-62 [p. 189-197, ed. Bonn].

34 Nov aiterum Orienti assurgit ruina quum nulla ab Occidentalibus ferrentur auxilia. Prosper Tyro composed his Chronicle in the West, and his observation implies a censure.

35 According to the description, or rather invective, of Chrysostom, an auction of Byzantine luxury must have been very productive. Every wealthy house possessed a semicircular table of massy silver, such as two men could scarcely lift, a vase of solid gold of the weight of forty pounds, cups, dishes, of the same metal, etc.

36 The articles of the treaty, expressed without much order or precision, may be found in Priscus (p. 34, 35, 36, 37, 53, etc. [ed. Par., p. 142-148, 178, etc., ed. Bonn]). Count Marcellinus dispenses some comfort by observing—1 That Attila himself solicited the peace and presents which he had formerly refused, and, 2 That, about the same time, the ambassadors of India presented a fine large tame tiger to the emperor Theodosius.

37 Priscus, p. 35, 36 [p. 143, 144, ed. Bonn]. Among the hundred and eighty two forts or castles of Thrace enumerated by Procopius (de Edificiis, l. iv c. xi tom. ii p. 92, edit. Paris [tom. iii p. 306, ed. Bonn]), there is one of the name of Enneria, whose position is doubtfully marked, in the neighbourhood of Anchialus and the Euxine Sea. The name and walls of Azimuntum might subsist till the reign of Justinian, but the race of its brave defenders had been carefully extirpated by the jealousy of the Roman princes.

38 The peevish dispute of St. Jerom and St. Augustin, who laboured by different expedients to reconcile the seeming quarrel of the two apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, depends on the solution of an important question (Middleton's Works vol. ii p. 5-10), which has been frequently agitated by catholic and protestant divines, and even by lawyers and philosophers of every age.

39 Montesquieu (Considerations sur la Grandeur, etc., c. xix) has delineated with a bold and easy pencil, some of the most striking circumstances of the pride of Attila and the disgrace of the Romans. He deserves the praise of having read the Fragments of Priscus, which have been too much disregarded.

40 See Priscus, p. 69, 71, 72, etc. [p. 208, 213, ed. Bonn]. I would fain believe that this adventurer was afterwards crucified by the order of Attila, on a suspicion of treasonable practices; but Priscus (p. 57 [p. 185, 186, ed. Bonn]) has too plainly distinguished the person of the name of Constantius, who from the similar events of their lives, might have been easily confounded.

41 In the Persian treaty, concluded in the year 421, the wise and eloquent Maximin had been the author of Ardaburius (Socrates, l. vii c. 29).

When Marcian ascended the throne, the office of Great Chamberlain was bestowed on Maximin, who is ranked in a public edict among the four principal ministers of state (Novell. ad Calc. Cod. Theod. p. 31 [tit. ii]). He executed a civil and military commission in the eastern provinces, and his death was lamented by the savages of Æthiopia, whose incursions he had repressed. See Priscus, p. 40, 41 [p. 153, 154, ed. Bonn].

42 Priscus was a native of Panium in Thrace, and deserved by his eloquence an honourable place among the sophists of the age. His Byzantine history, which related to his own times, was comprised in seven books. See Fabricius Biblioth. Græc. tom. vi p. 235, 236. Notwithstanding the charitable judgment of the critics, I suspect that Priscus was a Pagan.

43 The Huns themselves still continued to despise the labours of agriculture; they abused the privilege of a victorious nation, and the Goths, their industrious subjects, who cultivated the earth dreaded their neighbourhood, like that of so many ravenous wolves (Priscus, p. 45 [p. 163, ed. Bonn]). In the same manner the Sarts and Tadgies provide for their own subsistence, and for that of the Usbec Tartars, their lazy and rapacious sovereigns. See Genealogical History of the Turtars, p. 423, 455, etc.

44 It is evident that Priscus passed the Danube and the Theiss, and that he did not reach the foot of the Carpathian hills. Agria, Tokay, and Jazberin are situate in the plains circumscribed by this definition. M. de Buat (Histoire des Peuples, etc., tom. vii p. 461) has chosen Tokay. Orrolosci (p. 180, apud Mascou, ix 23), a learned Hungarian, has preferred Jazberin, a place about thirty six miles westward of Buda and the Danube.

45 The royal village of Attila may be compared to the city of Hracorum, the residence of the successors of Zingis, which, though it appears to have been a more stable habitation, did not equal the size or splendour of the town and abbey of St. Denys in the 13th century (see Rubruquis in the Histoire Générale des Voyages tom. vii p. 286). The camp of Aurengzebe as it is so agreeably described by Bernier (tom. ii p. 217-235), blended the manners of Scythia with the magnificence and luxury of Hindostan.

46 When the Moests displayed the spoils of Asia in the diet of Iconul, the throne of Zinnus was still covered with the original black felt carpet on which he had been seated when he was raised to the command of his warlike countrymen. See Vie de Gengiskan l. iv c. 6.

47 If we may believe Plutarch (in Demetrius tom. v p. 74) it was the custom of the Scythians when they indulged in the pleasures of the table to awaken their languid courage by the mutual harmony of swearing their brows sore.

48 The curious narrative of the semian, which required few observations, and was not unprofitable of any collateral evidence may be found in Priscus p 49-70 [ed Par p 170-209 ed Bonn] But I have not confined myself to the same order and I had previously extracted the historical circumstances which were less intimately connected with the journey and business of the Roman ambassadors

49 M de Tillemont has very properly given the succession of chamberlains who reigned in the name of Theodosius Chrysaphius was the last and according to the unanimous evidence of history the worst of these favourites (see Hist des Empereurs tom. vi. p 117-119 Mém Ecclésiast. tom. xv p 438) His partiality for his godfather the heresiarch Eutyches engaged him to persecute the orthodox party

50 This secret conspiracy and its important consequences may be traced in the fragments of Priscus p 37 38 39 54 70 71 72 [p 146-150 180 210-214 ed Bonn] The chronology of that historian is not fixed by any precise date but the series of negotiations between Attila and the East ern empire must be included within the three or four years which are terminated A D 450 by the death of Theodosius

51 Theodorus the Reader (see Vales Hist. Ecclésiast. tom. iii p 33) and the Paschal Chronicle mention the fall without specifying the injury but the consequence was so likely to happen and so unlikely to be invented that we may safely give credit to Nicéphorus Callistus a Greek of the fourteenth century

52 Pulcheriæ nutu (says Count Marcellinus) sua cum avaritia interemptus est She abandoned the eunuch to the pious revenge of a son whose father had suffered at his instigation

1 See Priscus p 39 72 [p 213 214 ed Bonn]

2 The Alexandrian or Paschal Chronicle which introduces this haughty message during the lifetime of Theodosius, may have anticipated the date but the dull annalist was incapable of inventing the original and genuine style of Attila

3 The second book of the Histoire Critique de l'Etablissement de la Monarchie Française tom. 1 p 189-424 throws great light on the state of Gaul when it was invaded by Attila but the ingenious author the Abbé Dubos too often bewilders himself in system and conjecture

4 Victor Vitensis (de Persecut Vandal l 1 c. 11 p 8 edit Ruinart) calls him acer consilio et strenuus in bello but his courage when he became unfortunate was censured as desperate rashness and Sebastian deserved or obtained the epithet of praecipuus (Sidon Apollinar. Carmen ix 281) His adventures at Constantinople in Sicily Gaul Spain and Africa are faintly marked in the Chronicles of Marcellinus and Idatius In his distress he was always followed by a numerous train since he could ravage the Hellespont and Propontis and seize the city of Barcelona

5 Republicæ Romanæ singulariter natus qui superbiam Suevorum Francorumque barbariem immensis cœdibus servire Imperio Romano coegisset Jornandes de Rebus Geticis c. 34 p 660

6 This portrait is drawn by Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus a contemporary historian known only by some extracts which are preserved by Gregory of Tours (l 1 c. 8 in tom 1 p 163) It was probably the duty or at least the interest of Renatus to magnify the virtues of Aëtius but he would have shown more dexterity if he had not insinuated on his patient forgiving disposition

7 The embassy consisted of Count Romulus of Promotus president of Noricum and of Romanus the military duke They were accompanied by Tatullus an illustrious citizen of Petovio in the same province and father of Orestes who had married the daughter of Count Romulus See Priscus p 57 65 [p 185 198 ed Bonn] Cassiodorus (Varior 1 4) mentions another embassy which was executed by his father and Carpilus the son of Aëtius and as Attila was no more he could safely boast of their manly intrepid behaviour in his presence

8 Deserta Valentiniæ urbis rura Alanis partem traduntur Prosper Tyronis Chron in Historiens de France tom 1 p 639 A few lines afterwards Prosper observes that lands in the ulterior Gaul were assigned to the Alani Without admitting the correction of Dubos (tom 1 p 300) the reasonable supposition of two colonies or garrisons of Alani will confirm his arguments and remove his objections

9 See Prosper Tyro p 639 Sidonius (Panegyrt Avit 246) complains in the name of Auvergne his native country—

Latorius Scythicos equites tunc forte subactos
Celsum Aremoricum Geticum rapiere in agmen
Per terras Arverne tuas qui proxima quæque
Discursu flammis ferro feritate rapinis
Delebant pacis fallentes nomen inane
Another poet Paulinus of Perlipord confirms the complaint

Nam socium vix ferre queas qui durior hoste.
See Dubos tom 1 p 330

10 Theodoric II, the son of Theodoric I, declares to Avitus his resolution of repairing, or expiating, the fault which his grandfather had committed

Quæ noster, peccavit avus, quem fuscet id unum,

Quod te, Roma, capit

Sidon Panegyric Avit 505

This character, applicable only to the great Alaric, establishes the genealogy of the Gothic kings, which has hitherto been unnoticed

11 The name of Sapaudia, the origin of Savoie, is first mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus [l. xv c. 11], and two military posts are ascertained by the Notitia within the limits of that province, a cohort was stationed at Grenoble in Dauphiné, and Ebrédunum, or Iverdun, sheltered a fleet of small vessels which commanded the lake of Neufchâtel See Valesius, Notit. Galliarum, p. 503. D'Anville, Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, p. 284, 579

12 Salvan has attempted to explain the moral government of the Deity, a task which may be readily performed by supposing that the calamities of the wicked are judgments, and those of the righteous, trials

13 —Capto terrarum damna patebant

Litorio in Rhodanum proprios producere fines,

Theodorice frivum, nec erat pugnare necesse,

Sed migrare Getis Rabidam trux asperat iram

Victor, quod sensit Scythicum sub mœnibus hostem

Impunit, et nihil est gravius, si forsitan unquam

Vincere contingat, trepido

Panegyric Avit 300, etc

Sidonius then proceeds, according to the duty of a Panegyrist, to transfer the whole merit from Aëtius to his minister Avitus

14 Theodoric II revered, in the person of Avitus, the character of his preceptor

—Mibi Romula dudum

Per te jura placent parvumque edicere jussit

Ad tua verba pater, docili quo prava Morosa

Carmine molliret Scythicos mihi pagina mores

Sidon Panegyric Avit 300, etc

15 Our authorities for the reign of Theodoric I are, Jornandes de Rebus Geticis, c. 31-36 and the Chronicles of Idatius and the two Prosper inserted in the Historians of France, tom. i. p. 612-619. To these we may add Salvan de Gubernatione Dei, l. vii. p. 243, 244, 245 and the Panegyric of Avitus by Sidonius

16 Reges Caru [super] re creaturae de primis et ut ita dicam, nobilitati suorum familia (l. reges et ut ita dicam, nobilitati suorum familia) of Theodoric I in c. 11 p. 166 of the second volume of the Historians of France. Gregory himself does not mention the Merovingian name, which may be traced, however, to the beginning of the seventh century, as the distinctive appellation of the royal family, and even of the French monarchy. An ingenious critic has deduced the Merovingians from the great Maroboduus, and he has clearly proved that the prince who gave his name to the first race was more ancient than the father of Childeric. See Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xx p. 52-90, tom. xxx p. 557-587

17 This German custom, which may be traced from Tacitus to Gregory of Tours, was at length adopted by the emperors of Constantinople. From a MS. of the tenth century, Montfaucon has delineated the representation of a similar ceremony, which the ignorance of the age had applied to King David. See Monumens de la Monarchie Française, tom. i. Discours Préliminaire

18 Cæsaries prolixa crinium flagellis per terga dismissis, etc. See the Preface to the third volume of the Historians of France and the Abbé Le Boëuf (Dissertation tom. iii. p. 47-79). This peculiar fashion of the Merovingians has been remarked by natives and strangers by Priscus (tom. i. p. 608 [p. 152, ed. Bonn]), by Agathangos (tom. ii. p. 49 [l. i. c. 3, p. 19, ed. Bonn]), and by Gregory of Tours (l. iii. 18, vi. 24, viii. 10, tom. ii. p. 196, 278, 316)

19 See an original picture of the figure, dress, arms, and temper of the ancient Franks, in Sidonius Apollinaris (Panegyric, Majorian 238-251), and such pictures, though coarsely drawn, have a real and intrinsic value. Father Daniel (Hist. de la Milice Française, tom. i. p. 2-7) has illustrated the description

20 Dubos, Hist. Critique, etc., tom. i. p. 271, 272. Some geographers have placed Disparicum on the German side of the Rhine. See a note of the Benedictine Editors to the Historians of France, tom. ii. p. 166

The precise spot was a town or village called Vicus Illera and both the name and the place are discovered by modern geographers at Lens. See Vales. Notit. Gall. p. 246. Longueur, Description de la France tom. ii. p. 61

24 See a vague account of the action in Sidonius Panegyric Majorian 212-230. The latter notices are important to establish the exact place in Gaul. I have drawn a plan of the battle of the Marne of Sidonius, who dates the battle as the vanquished Franks were engaged to retreat, at the Prince Disparicum l. ii. p. 166

25 Salvian (de Gubernat Dei l vi) has expressed in vague and declamatory language the misfortunes of these three cities which are distinctly ascertained by the learned Mascou Hist of the Ancient Germans ix 21

26 Priscus iii relating the contest does not name the two brothers the second of whom he had seen at Rome a beardless youth with long flowing hair (Historians of France tom i p 607 608 [p 152 ed Bonn]) The Benedictine Editors are inclined to believe that they were the sons of some unknown king of the Franks who reigned on the banks of the Neckar but the arguments of M de Foncemagne (Mém de l'Académie tom viii p 464) seem to prove that the succession of Clodion was disputed by his two sons and that the younger was Meroveus the father of Childeric

27 Under the Merovingian race the throne was hereditary but all the sons of the deceased monarch were equally entitled to their share of his treasures and territories See the Dissertations of M de Foncemagne in the sixth and eighth volumes of the Mémoires de l'Académie

28 A medal is still extant which exhibits the pleasing countenance of Honorius with the title of Augustus and on the reverse the improper legend of Salus Reipublice round the monogram of Christ See Ducange Famil Byzantin p 67 73

29 See Priscus p 39 40 [p 151 152 ed Bonn] It might be fairly alleged that if females could succeed to the throne Valentinian himself who had married the daughter and heiress of the younger Theodosius would have asserted her right to the Eastern empire

30 The adventures of Honorius are imperfectly related by Jornandes de Successione Regni c 97 and de Reb Get c 42 p 674 and in the Chronicles of Prosper and Marcellinus but they cannot be made consistent or probable unless we separate by an interval of time and place her intrigue with Eugenius and her invitation of Attila

31 Exegeras mihi ut promitterem tibi Attilae bellum stylo me posteris intimaturum cœperam scribere sed operis accepti fasce perspecto tædium inchoasse Sidon Apoll i viii Epist 15, p 246

33 The most authentic and circumstantial account of this war is contained in Jornandes (de Reb Geticis c. 36-41 p 662-672) who has sometimes abridged and sometimes transcribed the larger history of Cassiodorus Jornandes a quotation which it would be superfluous to repeat may be corrected and illustrated by Gregory of Tours l ii = 5 6 7 and the Chronicles of Idatius Isidore and the two Prosper All the ancient testimonies are collected and inserted in the Historians of France but the reader should be cautioned against a supposed extract from the Chronicle of Idatius (among the fragments of Fredegarius tom ii = 462) which often contradicts the genuine text of the Gallician bishop

34 The ancient legends deserve some regard as they are obliged to connect their fables with the real history of their own times See the Lives of St. Lupus St. Anianus the bishops of Metz St. Genevieve etc in the Historians of France tom i p 644 645 649 tom iii = 369

35 The scepticism of the Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples tom vii p 539 540) cannot be reconciled with any principles of reason or criticism Is not Gregory of Tours precise and positive in his account of the destruction of Metz? At the distance of no more than an hundred years could he be ignorant could the people be ignorant of the fate of a city the actual residence of his sovereigns the kings of Austrasia? The learned Count who seems to have undertaken the apology of Attila and the barbarians appeals to the false Idatius patens civitatibus Germaniae et Galliae and forgets that the true Idatius had explicitly affirmed plurimae civitates effractae among which he enumerates Metz

37 The policy of Attila of Aëtius and of the Vuigoths is imperfectly described in the Panegyric of Avitus and the thirty sixth chapter of Jornandes The poet and the historian were both biased by personal or national prejudices The former exalts the merit and importance of Avitus orbis Aviti salus etc! The latter is anxious to show the Goths in the most favourable light Yet their agreement when they are fairly interpreted is a proof of their veracity

38 The review of the army of Aëtius made by Jornandes c 36 p 664 edit Grot tom. ii p 23 of the Historians of France with the notes of the Benedictine editor The Leti were a promiscuous race of barbarians born or naturalised in Gaul and the Riparii or Ripuarii derived their name from the ri posts on the three rivers the Rhine the Meuse and the Moselle the Amerians possessed the independent cities between the Seine and the

41 Châlons, or Duro Catalaunum, afterwards Catalauni, had formerly made a part of the territory of Rheims, from whence it is distant only twenty seven miles See Vales Notit Gall p 136, D'Anville, Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, p 212, 279

42 The name of Campania, or Champagne, is frequently mentioned by Gregory of Tours, and that great province, of which Rheims was the capital, obeyed the command of a duke Vales Notit p 120-123

43 I am sensible that these military orations are usually composed by the historian, yet the old Ostrogoths, who had served under Attila, might repeat his discourse to Cassiodorus, the ideas, and even the expressions, have an original Scythian cast and I doubt whether an Italian of the sixth century would have thought of the hujus certaminis gaudia

44 The expressions of Jornandes, or rather of Cassiodorus, are extremely strong Bellum atroc, multiplex, immane, pertinax, cui simile nulle usquam narrat antiquitas ubi talia gesta referuntur, ut nihil esset quod in vita sua conspiciere potuisset egregius, qui hujus miraculi privaretur aspectu [c. 40 p 668] Dubos (Hist Critique, tom 1 p 392, 393) attempts to reconcile the 162,000 of Jornandes with the 300,000 of Idatius and Isidore, by supposing that the larger number included the total destruction of the war, the effects of disease, the slaughter of the unarmed people, etc

45 The Count de Burt (Hist des Peuples, etc, tom vii p 553-573), still depending on the false, and again rejecting the true, Idatius, has divided the defeat of Attila into two great battles the former near Orleans, the latter in Champagne in the one, Theodoric was slain, in the other, he was retained

46 Jornandes de Rebus Geticis c. 41, p 671 The policy of Aëtius and the behaviour of Torismund are extremely natural and the patrician, according to Gregory of Tours (I ii c. 7, p 163), dismissed the prince of the Franks by surmounting a similar apprehension The false idea was then a similar pretence that Aëtius paid a clandestine return visit to the kings of the Huns and of the Visigoths from each of whom he obtained a bribe of ten thousand pieces of gold as the price of an undisturbed retreat

47 These cruelties, which are passionately explored by Theodoric, the son of Clovis (Gregory of Tours, I iii c 10, p 190), suit the time and circumstances of the invasion of Attila His residence in Thuringia was long attested by popular tradition, and he is supposed to have assembled a couroultia, or diet, in the territory of Eisenach See Mascon, ix 30, who settles with nice accuracy the extent of ancient Thuringia, and derives its name from the Gothic tribe of the Thervingi

48 Machinis constructis, omnibusque tormentorum generibus adhibitis Jornandes, c 42, p 673 In the thirteenth century the Moguls battered the cities of China with large engines constructed by the Mahometans or Christians in their service, which threw stones from 150 to 300 pounds weight In the defence of their country the Chinese used gunpowder, and even bombs, above an hundred years before they were known in Europe yet even those celestial, or infernal, arms were insufficient to protect a pusillanimous nation See Gaubil, Hist des Mongous, p 70, 71, 155 157, etc

49 The same story is told by Jornandes and by Procopius (de Bell Vandal I i c. 4, p 187, 188 [tom 1 p 330, ed Bonn]) nor is it easy to decide which is the original But the Greek historian is guilty of an inexcusable mistake in placing the siege of Aquileia after the death of Aëtius

50 Jornandes, about an hundred years afterwards, affirms that Aquileia was so completely runned, ita ut vix ejus vestigia, ut apparent, reliquerint See Jornandes de Reb Geticis, c 42, p 673 Paul Diacon I ii c 14, p 785 [Grot Hist Goth] Luitprand, Hist I iii c 2 The name of Aquileia was sometimes applied to Forum Julii (Cividad del Friuli), the more recent capital of the Venetian province.

51 In describing this war of Attila, a war so famous but so imperfectly known, I have taken for my guides two learned Italians who considered the subject with some peculiar advantages Simonius, de Imperio Occidentali, I viii in his Works tom 1 p 405-502 and Muratori Annali d Italia, tom iv p 229-236, 8vo edition

The lion in Phædrus very foolishly appears from pictures to the amphitheatre and I am glad to observe that the native taste of La Fontaine (I iii fable x) has omitted this most lame and impotent conclusion

54 Paul the Deacon (de Gestis Langobard I ii c 14 [107], p 288) describes the provinces of Italy about the end of the sixth century. There is no room in paucis insulaeque maxime Venetiarum, quæ constant, et cetera in terminis a Langobardibus occupatis. Aëtius, however, in the preceding century, had been in possession of the Venetian provinces.

tory of that province till the age of Charlemagne forms the first and most interesting part of the Verona Illustrata (p. 1-388) in which the Marquis Scipio Maffei has shown himself equally capable of enlarged views and minute disquisitions.

55 This emigration is not attested by any contemporary evidence but the fact is proved by the event and the circumstances might be preserved by tradition. The citizens of Aquileia retired to the Isle of Gradus those of Padua to Rivus Altus or Rialto where the city of Venice was afterwards built etc.

56 The topography and antiquities of the Venetian islands from Gradus to Clochia or Chioggia are accurately stated in the Dissertatio Chorographica de Italia Medii Aevi p. 151-155.

57 Cassiodorus Variar. l. xii. Epist. 24 Maffei (Verona Illustrata part. i. p. 240-254) has translated and explained this curious letter in the spirit of a learned antiquarian and a faithful subject who considered Venice as the only legitimate offspring of the Roman republic. He fixes the date of the epistle and consequently the prefecture of Cassiodorus A. D. 523 and the Marquis's authority has the more weight as he had prepared an edition of his works and actually published a dissertation on the true orthography of his name. See Osservazioni Letterarie tom. ii. p. 290-339.

58 See in the second volume of Amelot de La Housaie, Histoire du Gouvernement de Venise, a translation of the famous Squittone. This book which has been exalted far above its merits is stained in every line with the disingenuous malevolence of party but the principal evidence genuine and apocryphal is brought together and the reader will easily choose the fair medium.

59 Sirmond (Not. ad Sidon. Apollin. p. 19) has published a curious passage from the Chronicle of Prosper Attila redintegratis viribus quas in Gallia amiserat Italiam ingredi per Pannonias intendit nihil duce nostro Actio secundum prioris belli opera prospiciente etc. He reproaches Actius with neglecting to guard the Alps and with a design to abandon Italy but this rash censure may at least be counterbalanced by the favourable testimonies of Idatius and Isidore.

60 See the original portraits of Avienus and his rival Basilus delineated and contrasted in the epistles (i. 9 p. 22) of Sidonius. He had studied the characters of the two chiefs of the senate but he attached himself to Basilus as the more solid and disinterested friend.

61 The character and principles of Leo may be traced in one hundred and forty-one original epistles which illustrate the ecclesiastical history of his long and busy pontificate from A. D. 440 to 461. See Dupin Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique tom. iii. part. ii. p. 120-165.

63 The Marquis Maffei (Verona Illustrata, part. i. p. 95 129 221 part. ii. p. 2 6) has illustrated with taste and learning this interesting topography. He places the interview of Attila and St. Leo near Anolica or Ardelica now Peschiera at the conflux of the lake and river ascertains the villa of Catullus in the delightful peninsula of Sirmio and discovers the Andes of Virgil in the village of Bades precisely situate quâ se subducere colles incipiunt where the Veronese hills imperceptibly slope down into the plain of Mantua.

64 Si statim infesto agmine urbem petissent grande discrimen esset sed in Venetiâ quo fere tractu Italia mollissima est ipsâ soli corlique elementa robur elangunt Ad hoc panis usq. carnisque coctæ et dulcedine vini mitigatus etc. This passage of Florus (iii. 3) is still more applicable to the Huns than to the Cambri and it may serve as a commentary on the celestial plague with which Idatius and Isidore have afflicted the troops of Attila.

65 The historian Priscus had positively mentioned the effect which this example produced on the mind of Attila. Jornandes c. 4 p. 673.

66 The picture of Raphael in the Vatican the basso (or perhaps the alto) relievo of Algardi on one of the altars of St. Peter's (see Dubos Réflexions sur la Poésie et sur la Peinture tom. i. p. 519 520) Baronius (Annal. Eccles. A. D. 452 No. 57 58) bravely sustains the truth of the apparition which is rejected however by the most learned and pious Catholics.

67 Attila ut Priscus historicus refert, extinctionis suæ tempore puellam Iudico nomine de coram valde sibi in matrimonium post innumerabiles uxores socias. Jornandes c. 49 p. 683 684. He afterwards adds (c. 50 p. 686) Gili Attilæ quorum per licentiam libidinis pœne populus fuit Polygamy has been established among the Tartars of every age. The rank of plebeian wives is regulated only by their personal charms and the faded matron prepares without a murmur the bed which is destined for her blooming rival. But in royal families the daughters of kings communicate to their sons a prior right of inheritance. See Genealogical History p. 406 407 408.

68 The report of her guilt reached Constantinople where it obtained a very different name and Marcellinus observes that the tyrant of Europe was slain in the night by the hand and the knife of a woman Cornille who has adapted the genuine account to his tragedy describes the eruption of blood in forty bombast lines and Attila exclaims with ridiculous fury

——— il ne veut s'arrêter (his blood)

(Dit il) on me payera ce qui m'en va coûter

69 The curious circumstances of the death and funeral of Attila are related by Jornandes (c. 49 p. 683 684 685) and were probably transcribed from Priscus.

70 See Jornandes, de Rebus Geticis, = 50, p 62, 685, 687, 688. His distinction of the national arms is curious and important. Nam ibi admirandum reor fuisse spectaculum, ubi cernere erat cunctis, pugnantem Gothum ense furem, Gepidam in vulnere suorum cuncta tela frangentem, Sarmum pede, Hunnum sagittâ præsumere, Alanum gravi, Herulûm, levi, armaturâ, aciem instruere. I am not precisely informed of the situation of the river Netad.

71 Two modern historians have thrown much new light on the ruin and division of the empire of Attila—M. de Buat, by his laborious and minute diligence (tom. viii. p. 3-31, 68-94) and M. de Guignes, by his extraordinary knowledge of the Chinese language and writers. See Hist. des Huns, tom. ii. p. 315-319.

72 Placidia died at Rome, November 27, A.D. 450. She was buried at Ravenna, where her sepulchre, and even her corpse, seated in a chair of cypress-wood, were preserved for ages. The empress received many compliments from the orthodox clergy, and St. Peter Chrysologus assured her that her zeal for the Trinity had been recompensed by an august trinity of children. See Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. tom. vi. p. 240.

73 Aëtium Placidus mactavit semivir amens, is the expression of Sidonius (Panegy. Avit. 359). The poet knew the world, and was not inclined to flatter a minister who had injured or disgraced Avitus and Majorian, the successive heroes of his song.

74 With regard to the cause and circumstances of the deaths of Aëtius and Valentinian, our information is dark and imperfect. Procopius (de Bell. Vandal. l. i. c. 4, p. 186, 187, 188 [tom. i. p. 327-331, ed. Bonn]) is a fabulous writer for the events which precede his own memory. His narrative must therefore be supplied and corrected by five or six Chronicles, none of which were composed in Rome or Italy, and which can only express, in a few sentences, the popular rumours as they were conveyed to Gaul, Spain, Africa, Constantinople, or Alexandria.

75 This interpretation of Vettius, a celebrated augur, was quoted by Varro in the xviii. book of his Antiquities. Censorinus, de Die Natali, c. 17, p. 90, 91, edit. Havercamp.

76 According to Varro, the twelfth century would expire A = 447, but the uncertainty of the true era of Rome might allow some latitude of anticipation or delay. The poets of the age, Claudian (de Bell. Getico, 265) and Sidonius (in Panegy. Avit. 357), may be admitted as fair witnesses of the popular opinion.

See Dubos, Hist. Critique, tom. i.
p. 340-346

77 The fifth book of Salvian is filled with pathetic lamentations and vehement invectives. His immoderate freedom serves to prove the weakness, as well as the corruption, of the Roman government. His book was published after the loss of Africa (A.D. 439), and before Attila's war (A.D. 451).

78 The Bagaude of Spain, who fought pitched battles with the Roman troops, are repeatedly mentioned in the Chronicle of Idatius. Salvian has described their distress and rebellion in very forcible language. Itaque nomen civium Romanorum nunc ultro repudiatur ac fugitur, nec vile tamen [tantum] sed etiam abominabile pœne habetur. Et hunc est ut etiam hi qui ad barbaros non confugunt, barbari tamen esse coguntur, scilicet ut est pars magna Hispanorum, et non minima Gallorum. De Bagaude nunc mihi sermo est, qui per malos judices et cruentos spoliati, afflicti, necati postquam jus Romanæ libertatis amiserant, etiam honorem Romani nominis perdiderunt. Vocamus rebelles, vocamus perdutos quos esse compulsumus criminosos. De Gubernat. Dei, l. v. p. 158, 159.

Chapter XXXVI

1. Sidonius Apollinarius composed the thirteenth epistle of the second book to refute the paradox of the learned Serranus, who entertained a singular and generous enthusiasm for the deceased emperor. This epistle, with some indulgence, may claim the praise of an elegant composition and it throws much light on the character of Maximus. 2. Quartum primum, prædisquis, circumfusa, potest, is the train which Sidonius himself (l. i. Epist. 9) assigns to another senator of consular rank.

Horat. Carm. iii. 1

Sidonius concludes his letter with the story of Damocles which Cicero (Tusculan. v. 20, 21) had so inimitably told.

Notwithstanding the evidence of Procopius, Evagrius, Idatius, Marcellinus etc., the learned Muratori (Annali d'Italia, tom. vi. p. 240) doubts the reality of this invitation and observes with great truth, "Non si può di quanto sia facile il popolo a sognare e spacciare voci false." But his argument from the interval of time and place is extremely feeble. The first which grew near Car-

fiscium solutionum oneribus atrox etc Novell
Majorian tit iv p 34

42 The learned Greaves (vol. 1 p 329 330 331) has found by a diligent inquiry that aures of the Antonines weighed one hundred and eighteen and those of the fifth century only sixty eight English grains Majorian gives currency to all gold coin excepting only the Galle solidus from its deficiency not in the weight but in the standard

43 The whole edict (Novell Majorian tit vi p 35) is curious Antiquarum ædium dissipatur speciosa constructio et ut [earum] aliquid reparetur magna diruuntur Hinc jam oceano nascitur ut etiam unusquisque privatum ædificium construens per gratiam iudicium præsumere de publicis locis necessaria et transferre non dubitet etc With equal zeal but with less power Petrarch in the fourteenth century repeated the same complaints (Vie de Petrarque tom 1 p 326 327) If I prosecute this History I shall not be unmindful of the decline and fall of the city of Rome—an interesting object to which my plan was originally confined

44 The emperor chides the lenity of Rogatian consular of Tuscany in a style of acrimonious reproach which sounds almost like personal resentment (Novell tit ix p 37) The law of Majorian which punished obstinate widows was soon afterwards repealed by his successor Severus (Novell Sever tit 1 p 37)

45 Sidon Panegy Majorian 385-440

46 The review of the army and passage of the Alps contain the most tolerable passages of the Panegyric (470-552) M de Buat (Hist des Peuples etc tom viii p 49-55) is a more satisfactory commentator than either Savaron or Sirmond

47 Tā pā dēlaus ra dī Mōyos is the just and forcible distinction of Priscus (Excerpt Legat p 42 [p 156 ed Bonn]) in a short fragment which throws much light on the history of Majorian Jornandes has suppressed the defeat and alliance of the Visigoths which were solemnly proclaimed in Galicia and are marked in the Chronicle of Idatius

48 Florus l u c 2 He amuses himself with the poetical fancy that the trees had been transformed into ships and indeed the whole transaction as it is related in the first book of Polybius deviates too much from the probable course of human events

49 Interea duplici texu dum litore classem

Sidon Panegy Majorian

441-461

The number of ships which Priscus fixes at 300 is magnified by an indefinite comparison with the fleets of Agamemnon Xerxes and Augustus

50 Procopius de Bell Vandal l i c 7 p 194 [tom 1 p 341 ed Bonn] When Genseric conducted his unknown guest into the arsenal of Carthage the arms clashed of their own accord Ma-

jorian had tinged his yellow locks with a black colour

51 Spolusque potitus

Quo valuit dum pauper erat.

Panegy Majorian 330

He afterwards applies to Genseric unjustly as it should seem the vices of his subjects

52 He burnt the villages and poisoned the springs (Priscus p 42 [p 156 ed Bonn]) Dubos (Hist Critique tom 1 p 475) observes that the magazines which the Moors buried in the earth might escape his destructive search Two or three hundred pits are sometimes dug in the same place and each pit contains at least four hundred bushels of corn Shaw's Travels p 139

53 Idatius who was safe in Galicia from the power of Ricimer boldly and honestly declares Vandals per proditores admoniti etc. he dissembles however the name of the traitor

54 Procop de Bell Vandal l i c 7 p 194 [tom 1 p 341 ed Bonn] The testimony of Idatius is fair and impartial Majorianum de Gallis Romanam redeuntem et Romano imperio vel nominis res necessarias ordinantem Ricimer hore per citus et inciderum consilio sultus fraude interficit circumventum [Sirmondi Op tom ii p 311] Some read Succorum and I am unwilling to efface either of the words as they express the different accomplices who united in the conspiracy against Majorian

55 See the Epigrams of Ennodius No cccv inter Sirmond Opera tom 1 p 1903 It is flat and obscure but Ennodius was made bishop of Pavia fifty years after the death of Majorian and his praise deserves credit and regard

56 Sidonius gives a tedious account (l i Epist xi p 25-31) of a supper at Arles in which he was invited by Majorian a short time before his death He had no intention of praising a deceased emperor but a casual disinterested remark Subiit Augustus ut erat auctoritate servata cum se communioni dedisset joci pleaus outweighs the six hundred lines of his venal panegyric.

57 Sidonius (Panegy Anthem 317) dismisses him to heaven —

Auxerat Augustus naturæ lege Severus
Divorum numerum

And an old list of the emperors composed about the time of Justinian praises his piety and fixes his residence at Rome (Sirmond Not ad Sidon p 111 112)

58 Tillemont who is always scandalised by the virtues of infidels attributes this advantageous portrait of Marcellinus (which Sordas has preserved) to the partial zeal of some Pagan historian (Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 330)

59 Procopius de Bell Vandal l i c 6 p 191 [tom 1 p 336 ed Bonn] In various circumstances of the life of Marcellinus it is not easy to reconcile the Greek historian with the Latin Chronicles of the times

60 I must apply to Ægidius the praises which Sidonius (Panegyric Majorian 553) bestows on a nameless master-general, who commanded the rear guard of Majorian Idatus, from public report, commends his Christian piety, and Priscus mentions (p. 42 [p. 156, 157, ed. Bonn]) his military virtues.

61 Greg Turon I ii c 12, in tom II p 168. The Père Daniel, whose ideas were superficial and modern, has started some objections against the story of Chulderic (Hist de France, tom I Preface Historique, p lxxviii etc.), but they have been fairly satisfied by Dubos (Hist Critique, tom I p 460-510), and by two authors who disputed the prize of the Academy of Soissons (p 131-177, 310-339). With regard to the term of Chulderic's exile, it is necessary either to prolong the life of Ægidius beyond the date assigned by the Chronicle of Idatius, or to correct the text of Gregory, by reading quarto anno, instead of octavo.

62 The naval war of Genserig is described by Priscus (Excerpta Legation p 42 [p 157, ed Bonn]), Procopius (de Bell Vandal I i c 5, p 189, 190, and e 22, p 228 [tom i p 332, 399, and p 399, ed Bonn]), Victor Vitensis (de Persecut Vandal I i c 17, and Ruinart, p 467-481), and in the three panegyrics of Sidonius, whose chronological order is absurdly transposed in the editions both of Sarron and Sirmond (Auit Carm vii 441-451 Majorian Carm v 327-350, 385-440 Anthem Carm ii 348-386) In one passage the poet seems inspired by his subject, and expresses a strong idea by a lively image —

—Hinc Vandalus hostis

Urget et in nostrum numerosa classe quon-tannis

Militat excidium conversoque ordine fuit
Torrída Caucasos infert mihi Bytæ furores
[Carm. II. 347.]

63 The poet himself is compelled to acknowledge the distress of Rieimer —

Præterea invictus Ricimer, quem publica fata
Respiciunt, fregit solus vix Marte repellit
Piratum per rura vrbum

[Card # 352]

Italy addresses her complaint to the Tiber and Rome, at the solicitation of the river god transports herself to Constantinople, renounces her ancient claims, and implores the friendship of Aurora, the goddess of the East. This fabulous machinery, which the genius of Claudian had used and abused, is the constant and miserable resource of the muse of Sidonius.

64 The original authors of the reigns of Marcian, Leo, and Zeno are reduced to some imperfect fragments, whose deficiencies must be supplied from the more recent compilations of Theophanes, Zonaras and Cedrenus.

65. St. Pulcheria died A.D. 453 four years before her nominal husband, and her funeral was celebrated on the 10th of September by the modern Greeks; she bequeathed an immense patrimony to pious, or at least to ecclesiastical uses See Tillemont Memoires Ecclés tom vi p 181-184

66 See Procopius de Bell. Vandal. I. 1. § 4, p. 185 [tom. 1, p. 325, ed. Bonn].

67 From this disability of Aspar to ascend the throne, it may be inferred that the stain of Heresy was perpetual and indelible, while that of Barbarism disappeared in the second generation.

68 Theophanes, p. 95 [ed. Par., tom. 1 p. 170, ed. Bonn] This appears to be the first origin of a ceremony which all the Christian princes of the world have since adopted, and from which the clergy have deduced the most formidable consequences.

69 Cedrenus (p 346 [ed Par tom 1 p 607, ed Bonn]), who was conversant with the writers of better days, has preserved the remarkable words of Aspar, Βασίλειϋ τὸν ταυτην την ἀλουργίδα περιβεβλημενον οὐ λῶη διαφείδεσθαι

70 The power of the Isaurians agitated the Eastern empire in the two succeeding reigns of Zeno and Anastasius but it ended in the destruction of those barbarians, who maintained their fierce independence about two hundred and thirty years

71 ———Tali tu civis ab urbe

Augustus venit a proavis

The poet (Sidon Panegyric Anthem 67-306) then proceeds to relate the private life and fortunes of the future emperor, with which he must have been very imperfectly acquainted.

72 Sidonius discovers, with tolerable ingenuity, that this disappointment added new lustre to the virtues of Anthemius (210, etc.) who declined one sceptre and reluctantly accepted another (22, etc.)

73 The poet again celebrates the unanimity of all orders of the state (15-22), and the Chronicle of Idrius mentions the forces which attended his march.

74. Interveni etenim nuptus Patricii Ricimeris, cui filia perennis Augusti in spem publice securitatis copulabatur. The journey of Sidonius from Lyons and the festival of Rome are described with some spirit. L. I Epist. 5 p. 9-13 Epist. 6, p. 21.

75 Sidonius (l. l. l. p. 23-24) very fully states his motive, his labour, and his reward: "Hic ipse Princeps, si non judicium, certe eventum, boni operis acceptum." He was made bishop of Clermont a. d. 471 Tillamont W. n. Loxley 1913

76 The palace of Anthemus stood on the banks of the Propontis. In the ninth century, Alexis, the son-in-law of the emperor Thimouthius of a royal family, was obliged to purchase the ground at Antedias, a day's journey from which he undertook to deliver his subjects. 79 In the poetical works of Sidonius which he afterwards condemned (I iv Epist 16 p 285) the fabulous deities are the principal actors If Jerom was scourged by the angels for only reading Virgil the bishop of Clermont for such a vile imitation deserved an additional whipping from the Muses

80 Ovid (Fast I ii 267-452) has given an amusing description of the follies of antiquity which still inspired so much respect that a grave magistrate running naked through the streets was not an object of astonishment or laughter

81 See Dionys Halicarn I i [c 79] p 25 65 edit Hudson The Roman antiquaries Donatus (L ii c 18 ¶ 173 174) and Nardini (p 386 387) have laboured to ascertain the true situation of the Lupercal

82 Baronius published from the MSS of the Vatican this epistle of Pope Gelasius (A D 496 No 28-45) which is entitled Adversus Andromachum Senatorem cæterosque Romanos qui Lupercalia secundum morem pristinum colenda constituebant Gelasius always supposes that his adversaries are nominal Christians and that he may not yield to them in absurd prejudice he imputes to this harmless festival all the calamities of the age

83 Itaque nos quibus totius mundi regimen commisit superna provisio Pius et triumphator semper Augustus filius noster Anthemius hæc Divi ia Majestas et nostra creatio pietati ejus plenam Imperii commiserit potestatem etc Such is the dignified style of Leo whom Anthemius respectfully names Dominus ¶ Pater meus Princeps sacratissimus Leo See Novelli Anthem tit ii iii p 38 ad calcem Cod Theod

84 The expedition of Heraclius is clouded with difficulties (Tillemont Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 640) and it requires some dexterity to use the circumstances afforded by Theophanes without injury to the more respectable evidence of Procopius

85 The march of Cato from Berenice in the province of Cyrene was much longer than that of Heraclius from Tripoli He passed the deep sandy desert in thirty days and it was found necessary to provide besides the ordinary supplies a great number of skins filled with water and several Pylii who were supposed to possess the art of sucking the wounds which had been made by the serpents of their native country See Plutarch in Cato Uticens [c 56] tom iv p 275 Strabon Geograph I xvii p 1193 [p 836 ed Casaub]

86 The principal sum is clearly expressed by Procopius (de Bell Vandal I i c 6 p 191 [tom I ¶ 335 ed Bonn]) the smaller constituent parts which Tillemont (Hist des Empereurs tom vi p 396) has laboriously collected from the Byzantine writers are less certain and less important The historian Malchus laments the public misery (Excerpt ex Suida in Corp Hist Byzant p 58) but he is surely unjust when he charges Leo with hoarding the treasures which he extorted from the people [p 270 ed Bonn]

87 This promontory is forty miles from Carthage (Procop I i c 6 p 192 [De Bell Vandal tom i p 377 ed Bonn]) and twenty leagues from Sicily (Shaw's Travels p 89) Scipio landed farther in the bay at the fair promontory see the animated description of Livy xxix 26 27

88 Theophanes (p 100 [tom i p 179 ed Bonn]) affirms that many ships of the Vandals were sunk The assertion of Jornandes (de Successione Regn) that Basiliscus attacked Carthage must be understood in a very qualified sense

89 Damascius in Vit Isidore apud Phot p 1048 [p 342 ed Bekk] It will appear by comparing the three short chronicles of the times that Marcellinus had fought near Carthage and was killed in Sicily

90 For the African war see Procopius (de Bell Vandal I i c 6 p 191 192 193 [tom I p 335 399 ed Bonn]) Theophanes (p 99 100 101 [ed Par tom i p 179 399, ed Bonn]) Cedrenus (p 349 350 [tom i p 613 ed Bonn]) and Zonaras (tom ii i xiv p 50 51) Montesquieu (Considérations sur la Grandeur etc c xx tom. iii p 497) has made a judicious observation on the failure of these great naval armaments

91 Jornandes is our best guide through the reigns of Theodoric II and Euric (de Rebus Geticis c. 44, 45 46 47 p 675-681) Idatius ends too soon and Isidore is too sparing of the information which he might have given on the affairs of Spain The events that relate to Gaul are laboriously illustrated in the third book of the Abbé Dubor Hist Critique tom i ¶ 424-620

92 See Mariana Hist Hispan tom i L v c 3 p 162

93 An imperfect but original picture of Gaul, more especially of Auvergne is shown by Sidonius who as a senator and afterwards as a bishop was deeply interested in the fate of his country See I v [vii] Epist 1 5 9 etc

94 Sidonius I iii Epist 3 p 65-68 Greg Tu on I ii c 24 in tom ii p 174 Jornandes c 45 p 679 Perhaps Ecdicius was only the son in law of Avitus his wife's son by another husband.

95 Si nullæ a republica vires nulla præsidia si nullæ quantum rumor est Anthemius principis opes statuit et auctore nobilitas scu patriam di mutere scu capillos (Sidon I iii Epist 1 p 33)

The last words (Sirmond, Not p 25) may likewise denote the clerical tonsure, which was indeed the choice of Sidonius himself

96 The history of these Britons may be traced in Jornandes (c 45, p 678), Sidonius (I in Epistol 9, p 73, 74), and Gregory of Tours (I in c 18, in tom u p 170) Sidonius (who styles these mercenary troops argutos, armatos, tumultuosos, virtute, numero, contubernio, contumaces) addresses their general in a tone of friendship and familiarity

97 See Sidonius, l. i. Epist. 7, p. 15-20, with Simmond's notes. This letter does honour to his heart as well as to his understanding. The prose of Sidonius, however vitiated by a false and affected taste, is much superior to his insipid verses.

98 When the Capitol ceased to be a temple, it was appropriated to the use of the civil magistrate, and it is still the residence of the Roman senator. The jewellers, etc., might be allowed to expose their precious wares in the porticoes.

185 He execrates the crimes and applauds the punishment of Seronatus, perhaps with the indignation of a virtuous citizen, perhaps with the resentment of a personal enemy

102 Ricimer, under the reign of Anthemius, defeated and slew in battle Theodoric, king of the Alani (Jordanes, c. 45, p. 678). His sister had married the king of the Burgundians, and he maintained an intimate connection with the Suevic colony established in Pannonia and Noricum.

103 Galatam concitatum Sirmoud (in his notes to Eusebius (tom 1 p 658)) applies this appellation to Anthemius himself. The emperor was probably born in the province of Galatia, whose inhabitants, the Gallo-Grecians, were supposed to unite the vices of a savage and a corrupted people.

104 Iuphianus was thirty years bishop of Pavia (A.D. 467-497 see Tillmont, Mém. Ecclesiast. tom. vi. p. 783.) His name and actions would have been unknown to posterity if Ennodius one of his successors, had not written his Life (Sirmond, Opera, tom. i. p. 1647-1692) in which he represents him as one of the greatest characters of the age.

103 Ennodius (p. 1659-1664) has related the embassy of Iphiganius, and his narrative without and turgid as it must appear, still carries some curious passages in the fall of the Western empire.

106 Pseudo-Excerpt. Legation p. 74 (p. 210 ed Bonn) Procopius de Bell. Vandal. I. c. 6 p.
151 (tom. I. p. 236, ed Bonn) Rufinus and her daughter were restored after the death of Majorian. Perhaps the consulship of Olybrius (A.D. 464) was bestowed as a nuptial present.

107 The hostile appearance of Olybrius is fixed (notwithstanding the opinion of Pagi) by the duration of his reign. The secret connivance of Leo is acknowledged by Theophanes and the Paschal Chronicle. We are ignorant of his motives, but in this obscure period our ignorance extends to the most public and important facts.

108 Of the fourteen regions, or quarters, into which Rome was divided by Augustus, only one, the Janiculum, lay on the Tuscan side of the Tiber. But, in the fifth century, the Vatican suburb formed a considerable city, and in the ecclesiastical distribution, which had been recently made by Simplicius, the reigning pope, two of the seven regions or parishes of Rome depended on the church of St. Peter. See Nardini Roma Antica, p. 67. It would require a tedious dissertation to mark the circumstances in which I am inclined to depart from the topography of that learned Roman

109 Nuper Antheini et Ricimeri civili furore

Muratori (Annali d Italia tom 11 p 308 309), with the aid of a less imperfect MS of the Historia Miscella, have illustrated this dark and bloody transaction

110 Such had been the severae deformis urbe tota facies, when Rome was assaulted and stormed by the troops of Vespasian (see Treat Hist iii 82, 83), and every cause of mischief had since acquired much additional energy. The revolution of ages may bring round the same calamities: but ages may revolve without producing a Tacitus to describe them.

111 See Ducange, Famulus Byzantini p. 71-75. Arcobindus, who appears to have married the niece of the emperor Justinian, was the eighth descendant of the elder Theodosius.

112 The last revolutions of the Western empire are faintly marked in Theophanes (p. 100 [tom i p. 184 ed Bonn]) Jornandes (c. 45 p. 679), the Chronicle of Marcellinus, and the fragments of an anonymous writer, published by Valerius at the end of Ammianus (p. 716 717 [tom ii p. 303 17, ed Bipon]) If Photius had not been so wretchedly conceiv we should derive much information from

115 Epiphanius was sent ambassador from Nepos to the Visigoths for the purpose of ascertaining the finis Imperii Italici (Ennodius in Sarmond tom i p 1665-1669) His pathetic discourse concealed the disgraceful secret which soon excited the just and bitter complaints of the bishop of Clermont

116 Malchus apud Phot p 172 [p 54 b ed Bekk] Ennod Epigram lxxxii in Sarmond Oper tom i p 1879 Some doubt may however be raised on the identity of the emperor and the archbishop

117 Our knowledge of these mercenaries who subverted the Western empire is derived from Procopius (de Bell Gothico l i c i p 308 [tom ii p 6 ed Bonn]) The popular opinion and the recent historians represent Odoacer in the false light of a stranger and a king, who invaded Italy with an army of foreigners his native subjects

118 Orestes qui eo tempore quando Attila ad Italiam venit se illi junxit et ejus notarius factus fuerat Anonym. Vales p 716 [Amm Marc tom ii p 303 ed Bignon] He is mistaken in the date but we may credit his assertion that the secretary of Attila was the father of Augustulus

119 See Ennodius (in Vit Epiphani Sarmond tom i p 1669 1670) He adds weight in the narrative of Procopius though we may doubt whether the devil actually contrived the siege of Pavia to distress the bishop and his flock

120 Jornandes c 33 34 p 692-695 M de Buat (Hist des Peuples de l'Europe tom. viii p 221-228) has clearly explained the origin and adventures of Odoacer I am almost inclined to believe that he was the same who pillaged Angers and commanded a fleet of Savon pirates on the ocean Greg Turon l ii c 18 in tom ii p 170

121 Vade ad Italiam vade vilissimus nunc pelibus coopertus sed multus cito plurima largiturus Anonym Vales p 717 [Amm Marc ii p 305 ed. Bignon] He quotes the Life of St Severinus which is extant and contains much unknown and valuable history it was composed by his disciple Eugippius (A.D. 511) thirty years after his death. See Tillemont Mém Ecclési tom. xvi p 168-181

122 Theophanes who calls him a Goth affirms that he was educated nursed (τρέφεται) in Italy (p 102 [tom i p 184, ed Bonn]) and as this strong expression will not bear a literal interpretation it must be explained by long service in the Imperial guards

123 Nomen regis Odoacer assumpsit cum tamen neque purpurâ nec regalibus uteretur in signibus. Cassiodor in Chron. A.D. 476 He seems to have assumed the abstract title of a king without applying it to any particular nation or country

124 Malchus whose loss excites our regret has preserved (in Excerpt. Legat. p 93 [ed Par p 235, ed Bonn]) this extraordinary embassy from the senate to Zeno The anonymous fragment (p 717) and the extract from Candidus (apud Phot. p 176 [p 55 ed Bekk]) are likewise of some use.

125 The precise year in which the Western empire was extinguished is not positively ascertained The vulgar era of A.D. 476 appears to have the sanction of authentic chronicles. But the two dates as signed by Jornandes (c 46 p 680) would delay that great event to the year 479 and though M de Buat has overlooked his evidence, he produces (tom viii p 261-288) many collateral circumstances in support of the same opinion

126 See his medals in Ducange (Fam Byzantin p 81) Priscus (Excerpt. Legat p 57 [p 185 ed Bonn]) Maffei (Osservazioni Letterarie tom ii p 314) We may allege a famous and similar case The meanest subjects of the Roman empire assumed the illustrious name of Patricius which by the conversion of Ireland has been communicated to a whole nation

127 Ingređiens autem Ravennam deposuit Augustulum de regno cujus infantium misertus concessit ei sanguinem et quia pulcher erat tamen donavit ei reditum sex millis solidos et misit eum intra Campaniam cum parentibus suis libere vivere Anonym Vales p 716 [Amm Marc. tom ii p 303 ed Bignon] Jornandes says (c 46 p 680) in Lucullan Campaniæ castello exulâ pona damnavit

128 See the eloquent Declamation of Seneca (Epist lxxxvi) The philosopher might have recollected that all luxury is relative and that the elder Scipio whose manners were polished by study and conversation was himself accused of that vice by his ruder contemporaries (Livy xiii 19)

129 Sylla in the language of a soldier praised his peritia castrametandi (Plin Hist Natur xviii 7) Phædrus who makes us shady walks (lata viridis) the scene of an insipid fable (ii 5) has thus described the situation —

Caesar Tiberius quum petens Neapolim,
In Misenensem villam venisset suam

Quæ monte summo posita Luculli manu
Prospectat Siculum et despiciat Tuscum mare.

130 From seven myriads and a half to two hundred and fifty myriads of drachmæ. Yet even in the possession of Marius it was a luxurious retirement The Romans derided his indolence they soon bewailed his activity See Plutarch in Carus Marius

131 Lucullus had other villas of equal though various magnificence at Baia Naples Tuscum etc He boasted that he changed his climate with the storks and cranes Plutarch in the life of Lucullus

132 Severinus died in Noricum A.D. 482 Six years afterwards his body which scattered muracles as it passed was transported by his disciples into Italy The devotion of a Neapolitan lady invited the saint to the Lucullan villa in the place of Augustulus who was probably no more See Ba ronius (Annal Eccles AD 496, No 50, 51) and Tillemont (Mém Eccles tom xvi p 178-181), from the original Life by Eugippius. The narrative of the last migration of Severinus to Naples is likewise an authentic piece.

133 The consular Fasti may be found in Pagi or Muratori. The consuls named by Odoacer, or perhaps by the Roman senate, appear to have been acknowledged in the Eastern empire.

134 Sidonius Apollinaris (l. i Epist 9, p 22, edit Sirmond) has compared the two leading senators of his time (AD 468), Gennadius Avienus and Cæcina Basilus. To the former he assigns the specious, to the latter the solid, virtues of public and private life. A Basilus junior, possibly his son, was consul in the year 480.

135 Epiphanius interceded for the people of Pavia, and the king first granted an indulgence of five years, and afterwards relieved them from the oppression of Pelagius, the Prætorian præfect (Ennodius, in Vit St Epiphani, in Sirmond Oper tom i p 1670-1672).

136 See Baronius, Annal Eccles AD 483, No 10-15. Sixteen years afterwards the irregular proceedings of Basilus were condemned by pope Symmachus in a Roman synod.

137 The wars of Odoacer are concisely mentioned by Paul the Deacon (de Gest. Langobard l. i c. 19, p 757, edit Grot) and in the two Chronicles of Cassiodorus and Cuspinian. The Life of St Severinus, by Eugippius, which the Count de Buat (Hist des Peuples, etc, tom viii. c. i, 4, 8, 9) has diligently studied, illustrates the ruin of Noricum and the Bavarian antiquities.

138 Tacit Annal iii 54. The Recherches sur l'Administration des Terres chez les Romains (p 351-361) clearly state the progress of internal decay.

139 A famine, which afflicted Italy at the time of the irruption of Odoacer, king of the Heruli, is eloquently described in prose and verse by a French poet (Les Mois, tom ii p 174, 206, edit in 12mo). I am ignorant from whence he derives his information, but I am well assured that he relates some facts incompatible with the truth of history.

140 See the xxxixth epistle of St Ambrose [tom ii p 944, ed Bened] as it is quoted by Muratori, sopra le Antichità Italiane, tom. i Dissert. xxi p 354.

141 Emilia, Tuscia, ceteræque provincæ in quibus hominum prope nullus exsistit. Gelasius, Epist ad Andromachum, ap Baronium Annal Eccles AD 496, No 36.

142 Verumque confidentibus, latifundia perdere Italiam. Plin. Hist Natur xviii 7 [§ 3].

143 Such are the topics of consolation, or rather of patience, which Cicero (ad Familiares, lib ix Epist. 17) suggests to his friend Papirius Pætus, under the military despotism of Cæsar. The argument, however, of "vivere pulcherrimum duxi," is more forcibly addressed to a Roman philosopher, who possessed the free alternative of life or death.

Chapter XXXVII

1 The origin of the monastic institution has been laboriously discussed by Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom i p 1419-1426) and Helyot (Hist des Ordres Monastiques, tom i p 1-66). These authors are very learned and tolerably honest, and their difference of opinion shows the subject in its full extent. Yet the cautious Protestant, who distrusts any Popish guides, may consult the seventh book of Bingham's Christian Antiquities.

2 See Euseb Demonstrat Evangel. (l. i p 20, 21, edit Græc Rob Stephani, Paris, 1545). In his Ecclesiastical History, published twelve years after the Demonstration, Eusebius (l. i c. 17) asserts the Christianity of the Therapeutæ, but he appears ignorant that a similar institution was actually revived in Egypt.

3 Cassian (Collat xviii 5 [Manc. Bibl Patr t vii. p 203]) claims this origin for the institution of the Coenobites, which gradually decayed till it was renewed by Antony and his disciples.

4 Βελιμωρεστωρ γὰρ τὸ ὄνομα οὗ τοῦ ἀσκητοῦ τῆς ἐκείνης ἐποχῆς ἡ τοῦ ἐκείνου ἐκκλησίας. Τίσις αὐτῆς τῆς ἐκκλησίας τοῦ Σοῦδαν, ὡς κοινῶς καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς ἐκείνης ἐκκλησίας (l. l. c. 12, 13, 14) the origin and progress of this monkish philosophy (see Suri- cer Thesaur Eccles tom ii. p 1441). Some modern writers, Lapsius (tom ii p 448) Manuduct ad Philosoph Stois iii. 13) and La Mothe de Vayer (tom. ix de la Vertu des Pères, p 228-262), have compared the Carmelites to the Pythagoreans, and the Cynics to the Capucins.

5 The Carmelites derive their pedigree in regular succession from the prophet Elijah (see the Theses of Beziers, A M 1632, in Bayle's Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Œuvres tom i p 82, etc., and the pious irony of the Ordres Monastiques, an anonymous work, tom i p 1-433 Berlin, 1751). Rome and the inquisition of Spain silenced the profane criticism of the Jesuits of Flanders (Helvet, Hist. des Ordres Monastiques, tom i p 28-300), and the statue of Elijah the Carmelite has been erected in the church of St Peter (Voyages du P. Labat tom iii p 87).

6 Plin. Hist Natur x. 15. Gens sola et in toto orbe præter ceteras mira, et ne ulli semina essent venere abdicata sine pecunia, socia palmarum. Ita per seculorum in illa (interdixit edictu) gens eterna est in qua nemo na citur. Tam fecunda illa laborum vite præterita est. He places them beyond the noxious influence of the Nile, and names Ennada's and Massada as the nearest towns.

8 Τράμυρα μὲ μὲθ' οὐκ ἠτολμῶτο Athanas tom 11 in Vit St Anton p 452 [p 795 ed Bened 1698 cf c 72 p 849] and the assertion of his total ignorance has been received by many of the ancients and moderns But Tillemont (Mém. Ecclés tom vii p 666) shows by some probable arguments that Antony could read and write in the Coptic his native tongue and that he was only a stranger to the Greek letters The philosopher Synesius (p 51 [ed Par 1612]) acknowledges that the natural genius of Antony did not require the aid of learning

9 Arura autem erant ei trecentæ uberes et valde optimæ (Vit Patr l v [11] p 36) If the Arura be a square measure of an hundred Egyptian cubits (Rosweyde Onomasticon ad Vit Patrum p 1014 1015 [p 1009]) and the Egyptian cubit of all ages be equal to twenty two English inches (Greaves vol 1 p 233) the arura will consist of about three quarters of an English acre

10 The description of the monastery is given by Jerom (tom 1 p 248 249 in Vit Hilarion [tom 11 p 31, ed Vallars]) and the P Sicard (Missions du Levant tom v p 122-200) Their accounts cannot always be reconciled the father painted from his fancy and the Jesuit from his experience

12 Tabenne is a small island in the Nile in the diocese of Tentyra or Dendera between the modern town of Gurge and the ruins of ancient Thebes (D Anville p 194) M de Tillemont doubts whether it was an isle but I may conclude from his own facts that the primitive name was afterwards transferred to the great monastery of Bau or Pabau (Mém Ecclés tom vii p 678 688)

13 See in the Codex Regularum (published by Lucas Holstenius Rome 1661) a preface of St Jerom to his Latin version of the Rule of Pachomius tom 1 p 61 [tom 1 p 25 ed Augsb 1759]

14 Rufin c 5 in Vit Patrum p 459 He calls it civitas ampla valde et populosa and reckons twelve churches Strabo (l xvii p 1166 [p 812 ed Casaub]) and Ammianus (xxii 16) have made honourable mention of Oxyrinchus whose inhabitants adored a small fish in a magnificent temple

15. Quanti populi habentur in urbis tantæ

pene habentur in desertis multitudines monachorum Rufin c 7 in Vit Patrum p 461 He congratulates the fortunate change

16 The introduction of the monastic life into Rome and Italy is occasionally mentioned by Jerom tom 1 p 119 120 199

17 See the Life of Hilarion by St Jerom (tom 1 p 241 252 [tom 11 p 15 24 ed Vall]) The stories of Paul Hilarion and Malchus by the same author are admirably told and the only defect of these pleasing compositions is the want of truth and common sense

18 His original retreat was in a small village on the banks of the Iris not far from Neo-Cæsarea The ten or twelve years of his monastic life were disturbed by long and frequent avocations Some critics have disputed the authenticity of his ascetic rules but the external evidence is weighty and they can only prove that it is the work of a real or affected enthusiast See Tillemont Mém Ecclés tom iv p 636-644 Helyot Hist des Ordres Monastiques tom 1 p 175-181

19 See his Life and the three Dialogues by Sulpicius Severus who asserts (Dialog 1. 16) that the booksellers of Rome were delighted with the quick and ready sale of his popular work

20 When Hilarion sailed from Parætonium to Cape Pachynus he offered to pay his passage with a book of the Gospels Posthumian a Gallic monk who had visited Egypt found a merchant ship bound from Alexandria to Marseilles and performed the voyage in thirty days (Sulp Sever Dialog 1. 1) Athanasius who addressed his Life of St Anthony to the foreign monks was obliged to hasten the composition that it might be ready for the sailing of the fleets (tom 11 p 451 [tom 1 p 794 ed Bened. 1698])

21 See Jerom (tom 1 p 126) Assemani Biblnot Orient tom iv p 92 p 857-919 and Geddes Church History of Ethiopia p 29 30 31 The Abyssinian monks adhere very strictly to the primitive institution

23 All that learning can extract from the rubbish of the dark ages is copiously stated by Arch bishop Usher in his Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates cap xvi p 425-503

24 This small though not barren spot Iona Hy or Columbkil only two miles in length and one mile in breadth has been distinguished—1 By the monastery of St Columba founded A.D. 566 whose abbot exercised an extraordinary jurisdiction over the bishops of Caledonia 2 By a class library which afforded some hopes of an entire Livy and 3 By the tombs of sixty kings Scots Irish and Norwegians who reposed in holy ground See Usher (p 311 360-370) and Buchanan (Res Scot l 11 p 15 edit Ruddiman)

25. Chrysostom (in the first tome of the Benedictine edition) has consecrated three books to the praise and defence of the monastic life He is encouraged by the example of the ark to presume that none but the elect (the monks) can possibly be saved (I i p 55, 56) Elsewhere, indeed, he becomes more merciful (I iii p 83, 84), and allows different degrees of glory, like the sun, moon, and stars In his lively comparison of a king and a monk (I iii p 116-121), he supposes (what is hardly fair) that the king will be more sparingly rewarded, and more rigorously punished

26 Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom 1 p 1426-1469) and Mabillon (Œuvres Posthumes, tom ii p 115-158) The monks were gradually adopted as a part of the ecclesiastical hierarchy

27 Dr Middleton (vol 1 p 110) liberally censures the conduct and writings of Chrysostom, one of the most eloquent and successful advocates for the monastic life

28 Jerom's devout ladies form a very considerable portion of his works the particular treatise, which he styles the Epitaph of Paula (tom 1 p 169-192 [Ep 108, tom 1 p 684, ed Vallars ]), is an elaborate and extravagant panegyric The exordium is ridiculously turgid—"If all the members of my body were changed into tongues, and if all my limbs resounded with a human voice, yet should I be incapable," etc

29 Socrus Dei esse coepisti (Jerom tom 1 p 140, ad Eustochium), Rufinus (in Hieronym Op tom ii p 223), who was justly scandalised, asks his adversary, From what Pagan poet he had stolen an expression so impious and absurd?

30 Nunc autem veniunt plerumque ad hanc professionem servitutis Dei, et ex conditione servili, vel etiam liberati, vel propter hoc a Dominis liberati sive liberandi et ex vita rusticana, et ex opificum exercitatione, et plebeio labor Augustin de Oper Monach c. 22, ap Thomassin, Discipline de l'Eglise, tom iii p 1094 The Egyptian, who blamed Arsenius, owned that he led a more comfortable life as a monk than as a shepherd See Tillemont, Mém Ecclési tom xiv p 670

31 A Dominican friar (Voyages du P Labat, tom 1 p 10), who lodged at Cadix in a convent of his brethren, soon understood that their repose was never interrupted by nocturnal devotion, "quoique on ne laisse pas de sonner pour l'édification du peuple"

32 See a very sensible preface of Lucas Holstenius to the Codex Regularum The emperors attempted to support the obligation of public and private duties but the feeble dykes were swept away by the torrent of superstition and Justinian surpassed the most sanguine wishes of the monks (Thomassin, tom i p 1782-1799 and Bingham, Lib. c. 3 p 253)

33 The monastic institutions particularly those of Egypt, about the year 400 are described by four curious and devout travellers—Rufinus (Vit Patrum, l. ii lib p 474-556) Posthumus (Sulp. Ser. Dialog l.), Palladius (Hist Lausac in Vit Idum p 709 653 [703]), and Cassian (see in tom. vii P. Photoc. Max Patrum, his four first books of Institutes, and the twenty four Collations or Conferences)

34 The example of Malchus (Jerom tom 1 p 256 [tom ii p 44, ed Vallars ]), and the design of Cassian and his friend (Collation xxiv 1), are incontestable proofs of their freedom, which is elegantly described by Erasmus in his Life of St Jerom See Chardon, Hist des Sacramens, tom vi. p 279-300

35 See the Laws of Justinian (Novell cxxiii No 42 [Auth Coll ix tit vii ]), and of Lewis the Pious (in the Historians of France, tom vi p 427), and the actual jurisprudence of France, in Denisart (Decisions, etc, tom iv p 855, etc.)

36 The ancient Codex Regularum, collected by Benedict Anianinus, the reformer of the monks in the beginning of the ninth century, and published in the seventeenth by Lucas Holstenius, contains thirty different rules for men and women Of these seven were composed in Egypt, one in the East one in Cappadocia, one in Italy, one in Africa, four in Spain, eight in Gaul or France, and one in England

37 The rule of Columbanus, so prevalent in the West inflicts one hundred lashes for very slight offences (Cod Reg part ii p 174 [tom 1 p 178, ed 1750]) Before the time of Charlemagne the abbots indulged themselves in mutilating their monks, or putting out their eyes—a punishment much less cruel than the tremendous cade in face (the subterraneous dungeon, or sepulchre), which was afterwards invented See an admirable discourse of the learned Mabillon (Œuvres Posthumes, tom ii p 321-336), who, on this occasion, seems to be inspired by the genius of humanity For such an effort, I can forgive his defence of the holy tear of Vendome (p 361-390)

38 Sulp Sever (Dialog 1 12, 13 p 532, etc [ed Lugd B 1647] Cassian Institut l n c 26, 27 'Præcipua ibi virtus et prima est obedientia' Among the Verba seniorum (in Vit Patrum, l v p 617), the fourteenth libel or discourse is on the subject of obedience, and the Jesuit Rowleyde, who published that huge volume for the use of convents, has collected all the scattered passages in his two copious indexes

39 Dr Jortin (Remarks on Ecclesiastical History, vol ii p 161) has observed the scandalous valour of the Cappadocian monks, which was exemplified in the banishment of Chrysostom

40 Cassian has simply though copiously described the monastic habit of Egypt (Instit l I), to which Seremon (l iii c. 14) attributes such allegorical meaning and virtue

43 Some partial indulgences were granted to the lands and feet * Tantum ac omnia corporis membra unguet nisi causâ infirmitatis nec lavabitur aquâ nudo corpore nisi languor perspicuus sit. (Regul. Pachomii xxi part 1 p 78 (tom 1 p 31))

44 St Jerom in strong but indiscreet language expresses the most important use of fasting and abstinence. Non quod Deus universitatis Creator et Dominus intestinorum nostrorum rugit et in amitate ventris pulmonisque ardore delectetur sed quod aliter pudicitia tuta esse non possit (Op tom 1 p 137 ad Eustochium [Ep 22 tom 1 p 93 ed Vallars]). See the twelfth and twenty second Collations of Cassian de Castitate and de Illusionibus Nocturnis.

45 Edacitas in Græcis gula est in Gallis natura (Dialog 1 c. 4, p 521) Cassian fairly owns that the perfect model of abstinence cannot be imitated in Gaul on account of the acrum temperies and the qualitas nostræ fragilitatis (Institut iv 11). Among the Western rules that of Columbanus is the most austere he had been educated amidst the poverty of Ireland as rigid perhaps and inflexible as the abstemious virtue of Egypt. The rule of Isidore of Seville is the mildest on holidays he allows the use of flesh.

46 Those who drink only water and have no nutritious liquor ought at least to have a pound and a half (twenty four ounces) of bread every day. State of Prisons p 40 by Mr Howard.

47 See Cassian Collat ii 19 20 21. The small loaves or biscuit of six ounces each had obtained the name of Paxmaria (Rosweyde Onomasticon p 104, [1033]) Pachomius however allowed his monks some latitude in the quantity of their food but he made them work in proportion as they ate (Pallad in Hist Lausiac c 38 39 in Vit Patrum I vii p 736 737).

48 See the banquet to which Cassian (Collation viii 1) was invited by Serenus an Egyptian abbot.

49 See the Rule of St Benedict cap 39 40 (in Cod Reg part ii p 41 42 (tom 1 p 129 ed 1759)). Licet legamus vinum omnino monachorum non esse sed quia nostris temporibus id monachis persuaderi non potest he allows them a Roman hemina a measure which may be ascertained from Arbuthnot's Tables.

50 Such expressions as my book my cloak my shoes (Cassian Institut I iv c 13) were not less severely prohibited among the Western monks (Cod Regul part ii p 174 (tom 1 p 178) 235 288) and the Rule of Columbanus punished them with six lashes. The ironical author of the Ordres Monastiques who laughs at the foolish piety of modern convents seems ignorant that the ancients were equally absurd.

51 Two great masters of ecclesiastical science the P Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise tom iii p 1090-1139) and the P Mabillon (Etudes Monastiques tom. i ii 116-155) have seriously examined the manual labour of the monks which the former considers as a merit and the latter as a duty.

52 Mabillon (Etudes Monastiques tom I p. 47-55) has collected many curious facts to justify the literary labours of his predecessors both in the East and West. Books were copied in the ancient monasteries of Egypt (Cassian Institut I iv c 12) and by the disciples of St Martin (Sulp. Sever in Vit Martin c 7 p 473) Cassiodorus has allowed an ample scope for the studies of the monks and we shall not be scandalised if their pen sometimes wandered from Chrysostom and Augustin to Homer and Virgil.

53 Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise tom. iii p 118 145 146 171-179) has examined the revolution of the civil canon and common law. Modern France confirms the death which monks have inflicted on themselves and justly deprives them of all right of inheritance.

54 See Jerom (tom 1 p 176 183) The monk Pambo made a sublime answer to Melania who wished to specify the value of her gift — Do you offer it to me or to God? If to God it is who supports the mountains in a balance need not be informed of the weight of your plate. (Pallad Hist Lausiac c 10 in the Vit Patrum I viii p 715).

55 Τὸ πολὺ μέρος τῆς γῆς ἡ ὡσαύτῃ προφασίᾳ το μεταδίδου πᾶ των πτωχῶ τῶ πᾶ (ὡς ἴτι) πτωχοὶ κατασθῆται τῶ Ζωσὶμ I v [c. 23] p 324. Yet the wealth of the Eastern monks was far surpassed by the princely greatness of the Benedictines.

56 The sixth general council (the Quincent in Trullo Canon xlvii in Beveridge tom 1 p 213) restrains women from passing the night in a male or men in a female monastery. The seventh general council (the second Nicene Canon xx. in Beveridge tom 1 p 324) prohibits the erection of double or promiscuous monasteries of both sexes but it appears from Balsamon that the prohibition was not effectual. On the irregular pleasures and expenses of the clergy and monks see Thomassin tom iii p 1334-1368.

57 I have somewhere heard or read the frank confession of a Benedictine abbot. My vow of poverty has given me an hundred thousand crowns a year my vow of obedience has raised me to the rank of a sovereign prince. I forget the consequences of his vow of chastity.

58 Pior an Egyptian monk allowed his sister to see him but he shut his eyes during the whole visit. See Vit Patrum I iii p 504. Many such examples might be added.

59 The 7th 8th 29th 30th 31st 34th 37th 60th 86th and 95th articles of the Rule of Pachomius impose most intolerable laws of silence and mortification.

60 The diurnal and nocturnal prayers of the monks are copiously discussed by Cassian in the third and fourth books of his Institutions and he constantly prefers the liturgy which an angel had dictated to the monasteries of Tabernæ.

61 Cassian from his own experience described the acedia or listlessness of mind and body to which a monk was exposed when he sighed to find himself alone Sæpiusque egreditur et ingreditur cellam, et Solem velut ad occasum tardius properantem crebrius intuetur (Institut x 2)

62 The temptations and sufferings of Stagirius were communicated by that unfortunate youth to his friend St Chrysostom See Middleton's Works, vol 1 p 107-110 Something similar introduces the life of every saint, and the famous Inigo, or Ignatius, the founder of the Jesuits (Vida d'Inigo de Guisacoa, tom 1 p 29-38) may serve as a memorable example

63 Fleury, Hist Ecclesiastique, tom vii p 46 I have read somewhere in the Vita Patrum, but I cannot recover the place, that several, I believe many, of the monks, who did not reveal their temptations to the abbot, became guilty of suicide.

64 See the seventh and eighth Collations of Cassian, who gravely examines why the demons were grown less active and numerous since the time of St Antony Rosweyde's copious index to the Vita Patrum will point out a variety of infernal scenes The devils were most formidable in a female shape

65 For the distinction of the Cenobites and the Hemitæ especially in Egypt, see Jerom (tom 1 p 43, ad Rusticum [Ep 125, tom 1 p 932, ed Valars]), the first Dialogue of Sulpicius Severus, Rufinus (c 22, in Vit Patrum l ii p 478), Palladius (c 7, 69, in Vit Patrum, l viii p 712 758), and, above all, the eighteenth and nineteenth Collations of Cassian These writers, who compare the common and solitary life, reveal the abuse and danger of the latter

66 Sueret Thesaur Ecclesiast tom ii p 203 218 Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise tom 1 p 1501, 1502) gives a good account of these cells When Gerasimus founded his monastery in the wilderness of Jordan, it was accompanied by a Laura of seventy cells

67 Theodoret, in a large volume (the Philothæus in Vit Patrum, l ix p 793-863) has collected the lives and miracles of thirty Anachorets Evagrius (l i c 21) more briefly celebrates the monks and hermits of Palestine

68 Soromen, l vi c 33 The great St Ephrem composed a panegyric on these phoroi or grazing monks (Tillemont, Mém Eccles tom viii p 292)

69 The P Sicard (Missions du Levant tom ii p 217-233) examined the caverns of the Lower Thebais with wonder and devotion. The inscriptions are in the old Syriac character which was used by the Christians of Abyssinia

70 See Theodoret (in Vit Patrum l ix p 848-854), Antony (in Vit Patrum l i p 170-177), Cormai (in Asseman Biblioth Oriental tom 1 p 219-233), Evagrius (l i c 13 14) and Tillemont (Mém Eccles tom vi p 347 39)

71 The narrow circumference of two cubits or three feet which I variously assign for the summit of the column, is inconsistent with reason with facts and with the rules of a chitecture The people who saw it from below might be easily deceived.

72 I must not conceal a piece of ancient scandal concerning the origin of this ulcer It has been reported that the Devil, assuming an angelic form, invited him to ascend, like Elijah, into a fiery chariot The saint too hastily raised his foot, and Satan seized the moment of inflicting this chastisement on his vanity

73 I know not how to select or specify the miracles contained in the Vita Patrum of Rosweyde, as the number very much exceeds the thousand pages of that voluminous work An elegant specimen may be found in the Dialogues of Sulpicius Severus and his Life of St Martin He reveres the monks of Egypt yet he insults them with the remark that they never raised the dead whereas the bishop of Tours had restored three dead men to life

74 On the subject of Ulphilas and the conversion of the Goths see Soromen, l vi c 37 Socrates l iv c 33 Theodoret l iv c 37 Philostorg l ii c 5 The heresy of Philostorgius appears to have given him superior means of information

75 A mutilated copy of the four Gospels in the Gothic version was published A D 1665 and is esteemed the most ancient monument of the Teutonic language though Weistien attempts by some frivolous conjectures to deprive Ulphilas of the honour of the work Two of the four additional letters express the B and our own T See Simon, Hist Critique du Nouveau Testament, tom ii p 219-223 Mill Prolegom p 151, edit Kuster Weistien Prolegom tom 1 p 114

76 Philostorgius erroneously places this passage under the reign of Constantine but I am much inclined to believe that it preceded the great emigration

77 We are obliged to Jornandes (de Reb Get c 51 p 683) for a short and lively picture of these lesser Goths Gothi minores populus immensus cum suo Pontifice ipsoque primate Wulfila The last words if they are not mere tautology, imply some temporal jurisdiction

78 At non ita Gothi non ita Vandali maluissent doctoribus institui meliores tamen erunt in hac parte quam nostri Salvian de Cubern Dei, l vii p 243 [ed Par 1608]

79 Mosheim has slightly sketched the progress of Christianity in the North from the fourth to the fourteenth century The subject would afford materials for an ecclesiastical and even political history

80 To such a cause has Socrates (l vi c 36) ascribed the conversion of the Ripuarian a lone Christian party is celebrated by Orosius (l vi c 16 [32])

81 See an original and curious epistle from Daniel the Bishop of Winchester (Beda l i c 14) to St Boniface who preached the Gospel among the heathens of Hesse and Thuringia [Ep 11] in Isenhus in the Maxima l i c 14 [Isenhus tom viii p 91]

82 The sword of Charlemagne is preserved

the argument but when Daniel wrote this epistle (A D 723) the Mahometans who reigned from India to Spain might have retorted it against the Christians

83 The opinions of Ulphilas and the Goths inclined to semi Arianism since they would not say that the Son was a creature though they held communion with those who maintained that heresy Their apostle represented the whole controversy as a question of trifling moment which had been raised by the passions of the clergy Theodoret I iv c 37

84 The Arianism of the Goths has been imputed to the emperor Valens Itaque justo Dei iudicio ipsi cum vivum incendunt qui propter eum etiam mortui vitio erroris arserunt Orosius I vii c 33 p 554 This cruel sentence is confirmed by Tillemont (Mém Ecclési tom vi p 604-610) who coolly observes un seul homme entraînait dans l'enfer un nombre infini de Septentrionaux etc Salvian (de Gubern Dei I v p 150 151) pities and excuses their involuntary error

85 Orosius affirms in the year 416 (I vii c 41 p 580) that the churches of Christ (of the catholics) were filled with Huns Suevi Vandals Burgundians

86 Radbod king of the Frisians was so much scandalised by this rash declaration of a missionary that he drew back his foot after he had entered the baptismal font See Fleury Hist Ecclési tom ix p 167

87 The epistles of Sidonius bishop of Clermont under the Visigoths and of Avitus bishop of Vienne under the Burgundians explain sometimes in dark hints the general dispositions of the catholics The history of Clovis and Theodoric will suggest some particular facts

88 Genserius confessed the resemblance by the severity with which he punished such indiscreet allusions Victor Vitensis I 7 p 10

89 Such are the contemporary complaints of Sidonius bishop of Clermont (I vii c. 6 p 182 etc edit Sirmond) Gregory of Tours who quotes this Epistle (I ii c 25 in tom II p 174) extorts an unwarrantable assertion that of the nine vacancies in Aquitaine some had been produced by episcopal martyrdoms

90 The original monuments of the Vandal persecution are preserved in the five books of the history of Victor Vitensis (de Persecutione Vandalica) a bishop who was exiled by Hunneric in the Life of St Fulgentius who was distinguished in the persecution of Thrasimund (in Biblioth Max Patrum tom ix p 4-16) and in the first book of the Vandalic War by the impartial Procopius (c 7 8 p 196 197 198 199 [ed Paris tom I p 344 sqq ed Bonn]) Dom Ruinart the last editor of Victor has illustrated the whole subject with a copious and learned apparatus of notes and supplement (Paris 1694)

91 Victor iv 2 p 65 Hunneric refuses the name of Catholic to the Homoiousians He describes, as the veri Divinae Majestatis cultores his own party who professed the faith confirmed by more than a thousand bishops in the synods of Rimini and Seleucia

92 Victor II 1 p 21, 22 Laudabilior videbatur In the MSS which omit this word the passage is unintelligible See Ruinart Not p 164

93 Victor II 2 p 22 23 [21 22] The clergy of Carthage called these conditions periculosa and they seem indeed to have been proposed as a snare to entrap the catholic bishops

94 See the narrative of this conference and the treatment of the bishops in Victor II 13-18 p 35-42 and the whole fourth book p 63-71 The third book p 42-62 is entirely filled by their apology or confession of faith

95 See the list of the African bishops in Victor p 117-140 and Ruinart's notes p 215-397 The schismatic name of Donatus frequently occurs and they appear to have adopted (like our fanatics of the last age) the pious appellations of Deodatus Deogratius Quodvultides Habideum etc

96 Fulgentius Vit c. 16-29 Thrasimund affected the praise of moderation and learning and Fulgentius addressed three books of controversy to the Arian tyrant whom he styles psumme Rex Biblioth Max Patrum tom ix p 41 Only sixty bishops are mentioned as exiles in the Life of Fulgentius they are increased to one hundred and twenty by Victor Tunnunensis and Isidore but the number of two hundred and twenty is specified in the Historia Miscella and a short authentic chronicle of the times See Ruinart p 570 571

97 See the base and insipid epigrams of the Stoic who could not support exile with more fortitude than Ovid Cornica might not produce corn wine, or oil but it could not be destitute of grass water and even fire

98 Si ob gravitatem caeli interissent male damnum Tacit Annal II 85 In this application Thrasimund would have adopted the reading of some critics male damnum

99 See these preludes of a general persecution in Victor II c 3 4 7 and the two edicts of Hunneric I II p 35 I IV p 64

100 See Procopius de Bell Vandal I c 7 [c 8] p 197 198 [tom I p 344 sqq ed Bonn] A Moorish prince endeavoured to propitiate the God of the Christians by his diligence to erase the marks of the Vandal sacrilege

101 See this story in Victor II 8-12 p 30-34 Victor describes the distress of these confessors as an eye witness

102 See the fifth book of Victor His passionate complaints are confirmed by the sober testimony of Procopius and the public declaration of the emperor Justinian Cod I I III xxvii

103 Victor II 18 p 41

104 Victor V 4 p 74, 75 His name was Victorianus and he was a wealthy citizen of Adrumetum who enjoyed the confidence of the king

by whose favour he had obtained the office, or at least the title, of proconsul of Africa

105 Victor, i 6, p 8, ¶ After relating the firm resistance and dexterous reply of Count Sebastian, he adds, quare alio [alius] generis argumento postea bellicosum virum occidit

106 Victor, v 12, 13 Tillemont, Mém Eccles tom vi p 609

107 Primale was more properly the title of the bishop of Carthage, but the name of patriarch was given by the sects and nations to their principal ecclesiastic See Thomassin, Discipline de l'Église, tom i p 155, 158

108 The patriarch Cyrila himself publicly declared that he did not understand Latin (Victor, ii 18, p 42) Nescio Latine, and he might converse with tolerable ease, without being capable of disputing or preaching in that language His Vandal clergy were still more ignorant, and small confidence could be placed in the Africans who had conformed

109 Victor, ii 1, 2, p 22

110 Victor, v 7, p 77 He appeals to the ambassador himself, whose name was Uranus

111 Astutores, Victor, iv 4, p 70 He plainly intimates that their quotation of the Gospel, "Non jurabis in toto," was only meant to elude the obligation of an inconvenient oath The forty-six bishops who refused were banished to Corsica, the three hundred and two who swore were distributed through the provinces of Africa

112 Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspe, in the Byzantine province, was of a senatorial family and had received a liberal education He could repeat all Homer and Menander before he was allowed to study Latin, his native tongue (Vit Fulgent c 1) Many African bishops might understand Greek, and many Greek theologians were translated into Latin

113 Compare the two prefaces to the Dialogue of Vigilius of Thapsus (p 118, 119 edit Clusset) He might amuse his learned reader with an innocent fiction, but the subject was too grave, and the Africans were too ignorant

114 The P. Quesnel started this opinion which has been favourably received But the three following truths, however surprising they may seem are now universally acknowledged (Gerard Vossius tom vi p 516-522 Tillemont, Mém Eccles tom viii p 667-671) 1 St Athanasius is not the author of the creed which is so frequently read in our churches 2 It does not appear to have existed within a century after his death 3 It was originally composed in the Latin tongue and consequently, in the Western provinces Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, was so much amazed by this extraordinary composition that he frankly proposed it to be the work of a drunken man Ictus Dymat Theologia tom ii l viii c 8 p 67

115 1 John v 7 See Simon His Critique d'Écriture Testament, part i c. xviii p 203-218

and part ii = ix. p 99-121, and the elaborate Prolegomena and Annotations of Dr Mill and Wetstein to their editions of the Greek Testament In 1689 the papist Simon strove to be free, in 1707, the Protestant Mill wished to be a slave, in 1751, the Arminian Wetstein used the liberty of his times and of his sect

116 Of all the MSS now extant, above four-score in number, some of which are more than 1200 years old (Wetstein ad loc) The orthodox copies of the Vatican of the Complutensian editors, of Robert Stephens, are become invisible, and the two MSS of Dublin and Berlin are unworthy to form an exception See Emlyn's Works, vol ii p 227-255, 269-299 and M de Missy's four ingenious letters, in tom viii and ix. of the Journal Britannique

117 Or, more properly, by the four bishops who composed and published the profession of faith in the name of their brethren They styled this text luce clarius (Victor Vitensis de Persecut Vandal l iii = ii, p 54) It is quoted soon afterwards by the African polemic Vigilus and Fulgentius

118 In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the Bibles were corrected by Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, and by Nicolas cardinal and librarian of the Roman church, secundum orthodoxam fidem (Wetstein, Prolegom p 84, 85) Notwithstanding these corrections, the passage is still wanting in twenty five Latin MSS (Wetstein ad loc.), the oldest and the fairest two qualities seldom united, except in manuscripts

119 The art which the Germans had invented was applied in Italy to the profane writers of Rome and Greece. The original Greek of the New Testament was published about the same time (A D 1514, 1516 1520) by the industry of Erasmus and the munificence of Cardinal Nimes The Complutensian Polyglot cost the cardinal 50 000 ducats See Maittaire Annal Typograph tom ii p 2-8, 125-133 and Wetstein, Prolegomena, p 116-127

120 The three witnesses have been established in our Greek Testaments by the prudence of Erasmus the honest bigotry of the Complutensian editors the typographical fraud or error of Robert Stephens in the placing a crozier and the deliberate falsehood or strange misapprehension of Theodore Beza

126 See the two general historians of Spain Mariana (Hist de Rebus Hispanicæ tom 1 l v c 12-15 p 182-194) and Ferreras (French translation tom 11 p 206-247) Mariana almost forgets that he is a Jesuit to assume the style and spirit of a Roman classic Ferreras an industrious compiler reviews his facts and rectifies his chronology

129 The catholics who admitted the baptism of heretics repeated the rite or as it was afterwards styled the sacrament of confirmation to which they ascribed many mystic and marvellous prerogatives both visible and invisible See Charodon Hist des Sacrements tom 1 p 405-552

130 Oset or Julia Constantia was opposite to Seville on the northern side of the Bætis (Plin Hist Natur iii 3) and the authentic reference of Gregory of Tours (Hist Francor l vi c 43 p 288) deserves more credit than the name of Lusia (de Gloriâ Martyr n 24) which has been eagerly embraced by the vain and superstitious Portuguese (Ferreras Hist d Espagne tom 11 p 166)

131 This miracle was skilfully performed An Arian king sealed the doors and dug a deep trench round the church without being able to intercept the Easter supply of baptismal water

132 Ferreras (tom 11 p 168-175 A D 550) has illustrated the difficulties which regard the time and circumstances of the conversion of the Suevi They had been recently united by Leovigild to the Gothic monarchy of Spain

133 This addition to the Nicene or rather the Constantinopolitan creed was first made in the eighth council of Toledo A D 653 but it was the pressage of the popular doctrine (Gerard Vossius tom vi p 527 de tribus Symbolis)

134 See Gregor Magn l vii. Epist 126 apud Baronium Annal Eccles A D 599 No 25 26 [l iv Ep 122 tom 11 p 1031 ed Bened]

135 Paul Warnefrid (de Gestis Langobard l iv c 44 p 853 edit Grot) allows that Arianism still prevailed under the reign of Rotharis (A D 636-652) The pious deacon does not attempt to mark the precise era of the national conversion which was accomplished however before the end of the seventh century

138 The Jews pretend that they were introduced into Spain by the fleets of Solomon and the arms of Nebuchadnezzar that Hadrian transported forty thousand families of the tribe of Judah and ten thousand of the tribe of Benjamin etc Basnage Hist des Juifs tom vii c 9 p 240-256

139 Isidore at that time archbishop of Seville mentions disapproves and congratulates the zeal of Suebut (Chron Goth p 728 [ed Grot]) Baronius (A D 614 No 41) assigns the number on the evidence of Aimoin (l iv c. 22) but the evidence is weak and I have not been able to verify the quotation (Historians of France tom 11 p 127)

140 Basnage (tom viii c 13 p 380-400) faithfully represents the state of the Jews but he might have added from the canons of the Spanish councils and the laws of the Visigoths many curious circumstances essential to his subject though they are foreign to mine

Chapter XXXVIII

1 In this chapter I shall draw my quotations from the Recueil des Historiens des Gaules et de la France Paris 1738-1767 in eleven volumes in folio By the labour of Dom Bouquet and the other Benedictines all the original testimony as far as A D 1060 are disposed in chronological order and illustrated with learned notes Such a national work which will be continued to the year 1500, might provoke our emulation

2 Tacitus The Historics iv 73 74 To abridge Tacitus would indeed be presumptuous but I may select the general ideas which he applies to the present state and future revolutions of Gaul

3 Eadem semper causa Germanis transcendendi in Gallias, libido atque avaritia, et mutandæ sedis amor, ut relictis paludibus et solitudinibus suis, secundissimum hoc solum vosque ipsos possiderent

Nam pulsæ Romanis quid aliud quam bella omnium inter se gentium existent?

4 Sidonius Apollinaris ridicules, with affected wit and pleasantry, the hardships of his situation (Carm. vii in tom. i p. 811)

5 See Procopius de Bell. Gothico, l. i c. 12, in tom. ii p. 31 [tom. ii p. 64, ed. Bonn] The character of Grotius inclines me to believe that he has not substituted the Rhine for the Rhone (Hist. Gothorum p. 175) without the authority of some MS.

6 Sidonius, l. viii Epist. 3. 9, in tom. i p. 800 Jornandes de Rebus Geticis (c. 47, p. 686) justifies in some measure this portrait of the Gothic hero

7 I use the familiar appellation of Clovis, from the Latin Chlodovechus or Chloroveus. But the Ch expresses only the German aspiration, and the true name is not different from Ludwin or Lewis (Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xx. p. 68)

8 Greg. Turon. l. ii c. 12, in tom. ii p. 168 Basina speaks the language of nature: the Franks, who had seen her in their youth, might converse with Gregory in their old age, and the bishop of Tours could not wish to defame the mother of the first Christian king

9 The Abbé Dubos (Hist. Critique de l'Établissement de la Monarchie Française dans les Gaules, tom. i p. 630-650) has the merit of defining the primitive kingdom of Clovis, and of ascertaining the genuine number of his subjects

10 Ecclesiam prætermissam, vesprium densitate opplerim, etc. Vit. St. Vedasti, in tom. iii p. 372 This description supposes that Arras was possessed by the Pagans many years before the baptism of Clovis

11 Gregory of Tours (l. v c. i tom. ii p. 232) contrasts the poverty of Clovis with the wealth of his grandsons. Yet Remigius (in tom. iv p. 52) mentions his paucitas rerum, as sufficient for the redemption of captives

12 See Gregory (l. ii c. 27, 37, in tom. ii p. 175, 181, 182) The famous story of the sale of Sensons explains both the power and character of Clovis. As a point of controversy, it has been strangely tortured by Bouvilliers. Dubos and the other political antiquaries

13 The Duke of Nivernois, a noble statesman, who has mannered weighty and delicate negotiations ingeniously illustrated (Mém. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xx. p. 147-184) the political system of Clovis

14 M. Biet (in a Dissertation which deserves the prize of the Académie des Sciences p. 173-206) has accurately defined the nature and extent of the kingdom of Sensons, and has observed, but he has readily allowed the slight existence of Dubos

(tom. ii p. 54-57) to deprive him of Beauvais and Amiens

15 I may observe that Fredegarus in his epitome of Gregory of Tours (tom. ii p. 308 [c. 15]), has prudently substituted the name of Patricius for the incredible title of Rex Romanorum

16 Sidonius (l. v Epist. 5 in tom. i p. 794), who styles him the Solon the Amphion, of the barbarians, addresses this imaginary king in the tone of friendship and equality. From such offices of arbitration, the crafty Deioces had raised himself to the throne of the Medes (Herodot. l. i c. 96-100)

17 Campum sibi præparari jussit M. Biet (p. 226-251) has diligently ascertained this field of battle at Nogent, a Benedictine abbey, about ten miles to the north of Soissons. The ground was marked by a circle of Pagan sepulchres, and Clovis bestowed the adjacent lands of Leully and Coucy on the church of Rheims

18 See Cæsar Comment. de Bell. Gallic. ii 4, in tom. i p. 220, and the Notitie, tom. i p. 126. The three Fabrice of Soissons were, Scutaria, Belutaria, and Clavaria. The last supplied the complete armour of the heavy cuirassiers

19 The epithet must be confined to the circumstances: and history cannot justify the French prejudice of Gregory (l. ii c. 27, in tom. ii p. 175), ut Gothorum pavere nos est

20 Dubos has satisfied me (tom. i p. 277-286) that Gregory of Tours, his transcribers or his readers have repeatedly confounded the German kingdom of Thuringia beyond the Rhine, and the Gallic city of Torgna on the Meuse, which was more anciently the country of the Lburones, and more recently the diocese of Liège

21 Populi habitantes juxta Leinensis locum Alamanni dicuntur Servius, ad Virgil. Georgic. iv. 278 Dom. Bouquet (tom. i p. 817) has only alleged the more recent and corrupt text of Isidore of Seville

22 Gregory of Tours sends St. Lupicinus inter illa Justiniani deserti secretis, quæ, inter Burgundiam Alamannique sita, Aventuræ adjacent civitate in tom. i p. 648 M. de Wailleville (Hist. de la Confédération Helvétique tom. i p. 9, 10) has accurately defined the Helvetic limits of the duchy of Alamannia, and the Transjurane Burgundians. They were contemporary with the duces of Comminge and Avenche, or Lausanne and were all discriminated in modern history by the use of the German or French language

23 See Gallman de hellello section l. i c. 3 p. 11, 12 Within the ancient walls of Amiens the castle of Haples, the abbey of St. Remy, and the town of Laik have been converted into Theophilus's travel may compare them to the ruins of Roman towns of Gaul or Aquitaine many of which were destroyed by the invasions of the Franks. If he be truly a philosopher he will play the most anxious happiness of his own time

24 Gregory of Tours (l. ii c. 37 in tom. ii p. 181)

176 177 182) the Gesta Francorum (in tom ii p 551) and the epistle of Theodoric (Cassiodor Variar I ii Ep 41 in tom iv p 4) represent the defeat of the Alemanni. Some of their tribes settled in Rætia under the protection of Theodoric whose successors ceded the colony and their country to the grandson of Clovis. The state of the Alemanni under the Merovingian kings may be seen in Mascou (Hist of the Ancient Germans xi 8 etc Annotation xxvi) and Gullman (de Reb Helvet I ii c 10-12 p 72-80).

25 Clotilda or rather Gregory supposes that Clovis worshipped the gods of Greece and Rome. The fact is incredible and the mistake only shows how completely in less than a century the national religion of the Franks had been abolished and even forgotten.

26 Gregory of Tours relates the marriage and conversion of Clovis (I ii c 28-31 in tom ii p 175-178). Even Fredegarius or the nameless Epitomisier (in tom ii p 398-400) the author of the Gesta Francorum (in tom ii p 548-552) and Aimoin himself (I i ii 13-16 in tom iii p 37-40) may be heard without disdain. Tradition might long preserve some curious circumstances of these important transactions.

27 A traveller who returned from Rheims to Auvergne had stolen a copy of his Declamations from the secretary or bookseller of the modest archbishop (Sidonius Apollinaris I iv Epist 7). Four epistles of Remigius which are still extant (in tom iv ii 51 52 53) do not correspond with the splendid praise of Sidonius.

28 Hincmar one of the successors of Remigius (A D 845-88) has composed his Life (in tom iii p 373-380). The authority of ancient MSS of the church of Rheims might inspire some confidence which is destroyed however by the selfish and audacious fictions of Hincmar. It is remarkable enough that Remigius who was consecrated at the age of twenty two (A D 457) filled the episcopal chair seventy four years (Pagl Critica in Baron tom ii p 384 572).

29 A vial (the Saint Ampoule) of holy or rather celestial oil was brought down by a white dove for the baptism of Clovis and it is still used and renewed in the coronation of the kings of France. Hincmar (he aspired to the primacy of Gaul) is the first author of this fable (in tom iii p 377) whose slight foundations the Abbé de Vertot (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom ii p 619-633) has undermined with profound respect and consummate dexterity.

30 Mitis depone colla Sicamber adora quod incendisti incende quod adorasti Greg Turon I ii c 31 in tom ii p 177.

31 Si ego ibi dem cum Francis meis fuisssem in iuriis ejus vindicasssem. This rash expression which Gregory has prudently concealed is celebrated by Fredegarius (Epitom c 21 in tom ii ii 400) Aimoin (I i c 16 in tom iii p 40) and the Chroniques de St Denis (I i c 20 in tom iii.

ii 171) as an admirable effusion of Christian zeal.

32 Gregory (I ii c 40-43 in tom ii ii 183-185) after coolly relating the repeated crimes and affected remorse of Clovis concludes perhaps undesignedly with a lesson which ambition will never hear— His ita transactus obit.

33 After the Gothic victory Clovis made rich offerings to St Martin of Tours. He wished to redeem his war horse by the gift of one hundred pieces of gold but the enchanted steed could not move from the stable till the price of his redemption had been doubled. This miracle provoked the king to exclaim Vere ii Martinus est bonus in auxilio sed carus in negotio (Gesta Francorum in tom ii p 554, 555).

34 See the epistle from Pope Anastasius to the royal convert (in tom iv p 50 51). Avitus bishop of Vienne addressed Clovis on the same subject (p 49) and many of the Latin bishops would assure him of their joy and attachment.

35 Instead of the Αρβόρ an unknown people who now appear in the text of Procopius (Bell Goth I i c 12) Hadrian de Valois has restored the proper name of the Αρβόρ χοι and this easy correction has been almost universally approved. Yet an unprejudiced reader would naturally suppose that Procopius means to describe a tribe of Germans in the alliance of Rome and not a confederacy of Gallic cities which had revolted from the empire.

36 This important digression of Procopius (de Bell Gothic I i c 12 in tom ii p 29-36 [tom ii p 62 199 ed Bonn]) illustrates the origin of the French monarchy. Yet I must observe 1 That the Greek historian betrays an inexcusable ignorance of the geography of the West 2 That these treaties and privileges which should leave some lasting traces are totally invisible in Gregory of Tours the Salic laws etc.

37 Regnum circa Rhodanum aut Varium cum provinciâ Massiliensi retinebant Gr ii Turon I ii c 32 in tom ii p 178. The province of Marcellus as far as the Durance was afterwards ceded to the Ostrogoths and the signatures of twenty five bishops are supposed to represent the kingdom of Burgundy A D 519 (Concil Epaon in tom iv p 104 105). Yet I would except Vindonissa. The bishop who lived under the Pagan Alemanni would naturally resort to the synods of the next Christian kingdom Mascou (in his four first annotations) has explained many circumstances relative to the Burgundian monarchy.

38 Mascou (Hist of the Germans xi 10) who very reasonably distrusts the testimony of Gregory of Tours has produced a passage from Avitus (Epist v) to prove that Gundobald affected to deplore the tragic event which his subjects affected to applaud.

39 See the original conference (in tom iv p 99-102) Avitus the principal actor and probably the secretary of the meeting was bishop of Vienne. A short account of his person and works may be found in Dupin (Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique, tom v p 5-10)

40 Gregory of Tours (I iii c. 19, in tom ii p 197) indulges his genius, or rather transcribes some more eloquent writer, in the description of Dijon—a castle, which already deserved the title of a city. It depended on the bishops of Langres till the twelfth century, and afterwards became the capital of the dukes of Burgundy. Longuerue, Description de la France, part i p 280

41 The Epitomiser of Gregory of Tours (in tom ii p 401) has supplied this number of Franks, but he rashly supposes that they were cut in pieces by Gundobald. The prudent Burgundian spared the soldiers of Clovis, and sent these captives to the king of the Visigoths, who settled them in the territory of Toulouse

42 In this Burgundian war I have followed Gregory of Tours (I ii c. 32, 33, in tom ii p 178, 179), whose narrative appears so incompatible with that of Procopius (de Bell Goth I i c. 12, in tom ii p 31, 32 [tom ii p 63, 399, ed Bonn]), that some critics have supposed two different wars. The Abbé Dubos (Hist Critique, etc., tom ii p 126-162) has distinctly represented the causes and the events

43 See his Life or legend (in tom iii p 402) A martyr how strangely has that word been distorted from its original sense of a common witness! St Sigismund was remarkable for the cure of fevers

44 Before the end of the fifth century, the church of St Maurice, and his Theban legion, had rendered Agrinum a place of devout pilgrimage. A promiscuous community of both sexes had introduced some deeds of darkness which were abolished (A ii 515) by the regular monastery of Sigismund. Within fifty years, his angels of light made a nocturnal rally to murder their bishop and his clergy. See, in the Bibliothèque Raisonnée (tom xxxvi p 435-438), the curious remarks of a learned librarian of Geneva

45 Marius, bishop of Avenche (Chron in tom ii p 15), has marked the authentic dates, and Gregory of Tours (I iii c 5 6, in tom ii p 188 189) has expressed the principal facts, of the life of Sigismund and the conquest of Burgundy. Procopius (in tom ii p 34 [tom ii p 65 ed Bonn]) and Apollonius (in tom ii p 40) show their remote and imperfect knowledge

46 Gregory of Tours (I ii c. 37, in tom ii p 181) inserts the short but persuasive speech of Clovis. Valde molere feci quod in Arminiam perueni. Calliarum (the author of the Get a Francorum in tom ii p 553 adds the precious epithet et inuicti, cuius cura Des adjuuato et superatus es. redigimus terram in diuisionem nostram

47 The text proceeds as in direction. Pipperum nam quod est fructus etc. (Get a Franc in tom ii p 554) The form et inuicti of the weapon are clearly described in Procopius (Get a Franc in tom ii p 47, 242, ed Bonn) I am persuaded that the et inuicti are in

Latin and French may be found in the Glossary of Ducange and the large Dictionnaire de Trevoux

48 It is singular enough that some important and authentic facts should be found in a Life of Quantianus, composed in rhyme in the old patois of Rouergue (Dubos, Hist Critique, etc., tom ii p 179)

49 Quamvis fortitudini vestrae confidentiam tribuat parentum vestrorum innumerabilis multitudo, quamvis Attilam potentem reminiscamini Visigotharum viribus inclinatam, tamen quia populorum ferocia corda longa pace mollescent, cave subito in alcam mittere, quos constat tantis temporibus exercitia non habere. Such was the salutary but fruitless advice of peace, of reason, and of Theodoric (Cassiodor I iii Ep ii [ed Rotom 1679])

50 Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws I xv c 13) mentions and approves the law of the Visigoths (I iv tit 2, in tom iv p 425), which obliged all masters to arm and send or lead into the field a tenth of their slaves

51 This mode of divination, by accepting as an omen the first sacred words which in particular circumstances should be presented to the eye or ear, was derived from the Pagans and the Priester or Bible was substituted to the poems of Homer and Virgil. From the fourth to the fourteenth century, these sortes sanctorum as they are styled, were repeatedly condemned by the decrees of councils, and repeatedly practised by kings, bishops, and saints. See a curious dissertation of the Abbé du Resnel in the Mémoires de l'Académie, tom. xiv p 287-310

52 After correcting the text or excusing the mistake of Procopius, who places the defeat of Alaric near Carcassonne, we may conclude, from the evidence of Gregory, Fortunatus and the author of the Get a Francorum that the battle was fought in campo l'adrasin, on the banks of the Clain, about ten miles to the south of Poitiers. Clovis overtook and attacked the Visigoths near Vivonne and the victory was decided near a village still named Champagné St Hilaire. See the Dissertations of the Abbé Le Beuf tom I p 304-331

53 Anroulme is in the road from Poitiers to Bordeaux and although Gregory delays the account I can more readily believe that he confounded the order of history than that Clovis neglected the rules of war

54 Hyentes montes inque Perpanianum sibi perit in the expression of Ronco which betrays the seven da s nee Perpanian did not exist before the tenth century (Marta Hispanica, p 450) The French and Sclavonian writer (perhaps a monk of Arment) who the Abbé Le Beuf Mémoires de l'Académie tom. xiv p 29 345 refers to the et inuicti of a story of a bishop and the personal history of Clovis, carries the French but his narrative ends with the death of Clovis

55 The et inuicti of the Get a Francorum poem is such a common place that it is not worth while to the Saintonge and Bourdeaux and he is not injudiciously followed by Rorico electos milites atque fortissimos cum parvulis atque mulieribus Yet it should seem that they soon mingled with the Romans of Aquitain till Charlemagne introduced a more numerous and powerful colony (Dubos Hist Critique tom ii p 215)

56 In the composition of the Gothic war I have used the following materials with due regard to their unequal value—Four epistles from Theodoric king of Italy (Cassiodor l iii Epist 1-4 in tom iv p 3-5) Procopius (de Bell Goth l i c. 11 in tom. ii p 32 33) Gregory of Tours (l ii c. 35 36 37 in tom ii p 181-183) Jornandes (de Reb Geticis c 58 in tom ii p 28), Fortunatus (in Vit St Hilari in tom iii p 380) Isidore (in Chron Goth in tom ii p 702) the Epitome of Gregory of Tours (in tom ii p 401) the author of the Gesta Francorum (in tom ii p 553-555) the Fragments of Fredegarius (in tom ii p 463) Aimoin (l i c 20 in tom iii p 41 42) and Rorico (l iv in tom iii p 14-19)

57 The Fasts of Italy would naturally reject a consul the enemy of their sovereign but any ingenious hypothesis that might explain the silence of Constantinople and Egypt (the Chronicle of Marcellinus and the Paschal) is overturned by the similar silence of Marius bishop of Avenche who composed his Fasts in the kingdom of Burgundy If the evidence of Gregory of Tours were less weighty and positive (l ii c 38 in tom ii p 183) I could believe that Clovis like Odoacer received the lasting title and honours of Patriarch (Pagi Critica tom ii p 474 492)

58 Under the Merovingian kings Marvellous still imported from the East paper wine oil linen silk precious stones spices etc The Gauls or Franks traded to Syria and the Syrians were established in Gaul See M de Guignes Mém de l'Académie tom xxxvi p 471-475

59 Οὐ γὰρ ποτε ὡς το Γαλλίας ἐ τὴ ἀσφαλείᾳ καὶ τηρεῖα φραγγ μὴ το ἀβ ο ρα ορος τὸ ἔργον ἐπισφραγίσα ος τοιῆ γι This strong declaration of Procopius (de Bell Goth l iii cap 33 in tom ii p 41 [tom. ii p 417 ed Bonn]) would almost suffice to justify the Abbé Dubos

60 The Franks who probably used the mints of Trèves Lyons and Arles imitated the coinage of the Roman emperors of seventy two solidi or pieces to the pound of gold But as the Franks established only a decuple proportion of gold and silver ten shillings will be a sufficient valuation of their solidus of gold It was the common standard of the barbaric lines and contained forty denarii or silver threepences Twelve of these denarii made a solidus or shilling the twentieth part of the ponderal and numeral libre or pound of silver which has been so strangely reduced in modern France. See Le Blanc Traité Historique des Monnoyes de France p 37-43 etc.

61 Agath as in tom ii p 47 [p 17 ed Bonn] Gregory of Tours exhibits a very different picture.

Perhaps it would not be easy within the same historical space, to find more vice and less virtue. We are continually shocked by the union of savage and corrupt manners

62 M de Foncemagne has traced in a correct and elegant dissertation (Mém de l'Académie tom viii p 505-528) the extent and limits of the French monarchy

63 The Abbé Dubos (Histoire Critique tom. i p 29-36) has truly and agreeably represented the slow progress of these studies and he observes that Gregory of Tours was only once printed before the year 1560 According to the complaint of Heineccius (Opera tom iii Sylloge iii p 248 etc) Germany received with indifference and contempt the codes of barbaric laws which were published by Heroldus Landebrogus etc At present those laws (as far as they relate to Gaul) the history of Gregory of Tours and all the monuments of the Merovingian race appear in a pure and perfect state in the first four volumes of the Historians of France

64 In the space of [about] thirty years (1728-1765) this interesting subject has been agitated by the free spirit of the Count de Boulainvilliers (Mémoires Historiques sur l'Etat de la France particulièrement tom i p 15-49) the learned ingenuity of the Abbé Dubos (Histoire Critique de l'Etablissement de la Monarchie Française dans les Gaules, 2 vols in 4to) the comprehensive genius of the President de Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws particularly l xxviii xxx xxxi) and the good sense and diligence of the Abbé de Mably (Observations sur l'Histoire de France 2 vols 12mo)

65 I have derived much instruction from two learned works of Heineccius—the History and the Elements of the Germanic law. In a judicious preface to the Elements he considers and tries to excuse the defects of that barbarous jurisprudence

66 Latin appears to have been the original language of the Salic law It was probably composed in the beginning of the fifth century before the era (AD 421) of the real or fabulous Pharamond The preface mentions the four cantons which produced the four legislators and many provinces—Franconia Saxony Hanover Brabant etc.—have claimed them as their own See an excellent Dissertation of Heineccius de Lege Salica tom iii Sylloge iii p 247-267

67 Eginhard in Vit Caroli Magni c 29 in tom i p 100 By these two laws most critics understand the Salic and the Riparian The former extended from the Carbonarian forest to the Loire (tom iv p 151 [Lex Sal tit L]) and the latter might be obeyed from the same forest to the Rhine (tom iv p 232)

68 Consult the ancient and modern prefaces of the several codes in the fourth volume of the Historians of France The original prologue to the Salic law expresses (though in a foreign dialect) the genuine spirit of the Franks more forcibly than the ten books of Gregory of Tours.

69. The Ripuarian law declares and defines this indulgence in favour of the plaintiff (tit xxx in tom iv p 240), and the same toleration is understood or expressed in all the codes except that of the Visigoths of Spain Tanta diversitas legum (says Agobard in the ninth century) quanta non solum in [singulis] regionibus, aut civitatibus, sed etiam in multis domibus habetur. Nam plerumque contingit ut simul eant aut sedcant quonque homines, et nullus eorum communem legem cum altero habeat (in tom vi p 356) He foolishly proposes to introduce an uniformity of law as well as of faith

70 Inter Romanos negotia cruarum Romanis legibus præcipimus terminari Such are the words of a general constitution promulgated by Clotaire, the son of Clovis, and sole monarch of the Franks (in tom iv p 116), about the year 560

71 This liberty of choice has been aptly deduced (The Spirit of Laws, l xxviii 2) from a constitution of Lothaire I (Leg Langobard I ii tit lvii in Co dex Lindebrog p 664), though the example is too recent and partial. From a various reading in the Salic law (tit xlv not xlv), the Abbé de Mably (tom i p 290-293) has conjectured that at first a barbarian only, and afterwards any man (consequently a Roman), might live according to the law of the Franks I am sorry to offend this ingenious conjecture by observing that the stricter sense (barbarum) is expressed in the reformed copy of Charlemagne, which is confirmed by the Royal and Wolfenbüttel MSS The looser interpretation (hominem) is authorised only by the MS of Fulda, from whence Heroldus published his edition See the four original texts of the Salic law, in tom iv p 147, 173, 196, 220

72 In the heroic times of Greece, the guilt of murder was expiated by a pecuniary satisfaction to the family of the deceased (Feithius Antiquitat Homer I ii c. 8) Heinæus, in his preface to the Elements of Germanic Law, favourably suggests that at Rome and Athens homicide was only punished with exile It is true but exile was a capital punishment for a citizen of Rome or Athens

73 This proportion is fixed by the Salic (tit xlv in tom iv p 147) and the Ripuarian (tit vii xi xxxvi in tom iv p 237, 241) laws, but the latter does not distinguish any difference of Romans Yet the orders of the clergy are placed above the Franks themselves, and the Burgundians and Alemanni between the Franks and the Romans

74 The Antiquitates of the first order of Franks, but it is a question whether their rank was personal or hereditary The Abbé de Mably (tom i p 334-347) is not displeased to mortify the pride of birth (The Spirit of Laws l xxx c 2,) by dating the origine of French nobility from the reign of Clotaire II (A D 615)

75 See the Burgundian laws (tit li in tom iv p 257) the code of the Visigoths (l vi tit vi in tom iv p 393), and the constitution of Charlemagne of 803, but most evidently of Louis the Great (A D tom iv p 112) Their premature severity was sometimes rash and excessive Childbert condemned not only murderers but robbers, quomodo sine lege involavit, sine lege moriatur, and even the negligent judge was involved in the same sentence The Visigoths abandoned an unsuccessful surgeon to the family of his deceased patient, ut quod de eo facere voluerint habeant potestatem (l vi tit i in tom iv p 435)

76 See in the sixth volume of the works of Heinæus, the Elementa Juris Germanici, l ii p ii No 261, 262, 280-283 Yet some vestiges of these pecuniary compositions for murder have been traced in Germany as late as the sixteenth century

77 The whole subject of the Germanic judges, and their jurisdiction, is copiously treated by Heinæus (Element Jur Germ l iii No 1-72) I cannot find any proof that, under the Merovingian race, the scabini, or assessors, were chosen by the people

78 Gregor Turon l viii c. 9, in tom ii p 316 Montesquieu observes (Espirit des Loix, l xxviii c 13) that the Salic law did not admit these rigid proofs so universally established in the barbaric codes Yet this obscure concubine (Fredegunda), who became the wife of the grandson of Clovis, must have followed the Salic law

79 Muratori, in the Antiquities of Italy, has given two Dissertations (xxviii xxix) on the judgements of God It was expected that fire would not burn the innocent, and that the pure element of water would not allow the guilty to sink into its bosom

80 Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l xxviii c 17) has condescended to explain and excuse "la manière de penser de nos pères" on the subject of judicial combats He follows this strange institution from the age of Gundobald to that of St Lewis and the philosopher is sometimes lost in the legal antiquarian

81 In a memorable duel at Aix la Chapelle (A D 820), before the emperor Lewis the Pious his biographer observes, secundum legem propriam utpote quia uterque Gothus erat equestri purnâ [puri] congressus (Vit Lud Pii c 33, in to m vi p 103) Einoldus Nessel in (l in 347-6-8 in tom vi p 48-50), who describes the duel, admires the ars = a of fighting on horseback, which was unknown to the Franks

82 In his original tract published at Lyons (A D 501) Gundobald established and justified the use of judicial combat (see Einold in tom vi p 48-50) A hundred years afterwards Agobard Bishop of Lyons rebuked Lewis the Pious to abolish the law of an Arrian tyrant (in tom vi p 35, 37) He recalled the origines of Gundobald and Arianism

83 Agobard's treatise De heretico (l i in tom vi p 35) is a very curious and interesting work on the subject of heresy and the use of the sword in the trial of heretics Q uoniam heretici certant in eodem

homicidia injusta, et crudeles ac perversi eventus judiciorum (tom vi p 357) Like a prudent rhetorician he suppresses the legal privilege of hiring champions

84 Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws xxviii c 14) who understands why the judicial combat was admitted by the Burgundians Ripuarians Alemanni Bavarians Lombards Thuringians Frisians and Saxons is satisfied (and Agobard seems to countenance the assertion) that it was not allowed by the Salic law Yet the same custom at least in cases of treason is mentioned by Ermoldus Nigellus (l iii 543 in tom vi p 48) and the anonymous biographer of Lewis the Pious (c 46 in tom vi p 112) as the mos antiquus Francorum more Francis solito etc expressions too general to exclude the noblest of their tribes

85 Caesar de Bell Gall l i c 31 in tom i p 213

86 The obscure hints of a division of lands occasionally scattered in the laws of the Burgundians (tit liv No 1 a in tom iv p 271 272) and Visigoths (l x tit 1 No 8 9 16 in tom iv p 428 429 430) are skillfully explained by the President Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l xxx c 7 8 9) I shall only add that among the Goths the division seems to have been ascertained by the judgment of the neighbourhood that the barbarians frequently usurped the remaining third and that the Romans might recover their right unless they were barred by a prescription of fifty years

87 It is singular enough that the President de Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l xxx c 7) and the Abbé de Mably (Observations tom 1 p 21 22) agree in this strange supposition of arbitrary and private rapine. The Count de Boulainvilliers (Etat de la France tom 1 p 22 23) shows a strong understanding through a cloud of ignorance and prejudice

88 See the rustic edict or rather code of Charlemagne which contains seventy distinct and minute regulations of that great monarch (in tom v p 652-657) He requires an account of the horns and skins of the goats allows his fish to be sold and carefully directs that the larger villas (Capitaneæ) shall maintain one hundred hens and thirty geese and the smaller (Mansionales) fifty hens and twelve geese Mabilon (de Re Diplomatica) has investigated the names the number and the situation of the Merovingian villas

89 From a passage of the Burgundian law (tit 1 No 4 [3] in tom iv p 257) it is evident that a deserving son might expect to hold the lands which his father had received from the royal bounty of Gundobald The Burgundians would firmly maintain their privilege and their example might encourage the beneficiaries of France

90 The revolutions of the benefices and fiefs are clearly fixed by the Abbé de Mably His accurate distinct on of times gives him a merit to which even Montesquieu is a stranger

91 See the Salic law (tit lxx in tom iv p 156)

The origin and nature of these Salic lands, which in times of ignorance were perfectly understood now perplex our most learned and sagacious critics

92 Many of the two hundred and six miracles of St Martin (Greg Turon in Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum tom xi p 896-932) were repeatedly performed to punish sacrilege Audite hæc omnes (exclaims the bishop of Tours) potestatem habentes after relating how some horses ran mad that had been turned into a sacred meadow

95 On a mere suspicion Chundo a chamberlain of Gontram king of Burgundy was stoned to death (Greg Turon l x c 10 in tom ii p 369) John of Salisbury (Polycrat l i c 4) asserts the rights of nature and exposes the cruel practice of the twelfth century See Heinemann Elem. Jur Germ l ii p 1, No 31-37

96 The custom of enslaving prisoners of war was totally extinguished in the thirteenth century by the prevailing influence of Christianity but it might be proved from frequent passages of Gregory of Tours etc that it was practised without censure under the Merovingian race and even Grotius himself (de Jure Belli et Pacis l iii c 7) as well as his commentator Barbeyrac have laboured to reconcile it with the laws of nature and reason

97 The state professions etc of the German, Italian and Gallic slaves during the middle ages, are explained by Heinemann (Element Jur Germ l i No 28-47) Muratori (Dissertat xiv xv) Ducange (Gloss sub voce Servi) and the Abbé de Mably (Observations tom ii p 3 etc 237 etc)

98 Gregory of Tours (l vi c 45 in tom ii p 289) relates a memorable example in which Chilperic only abused the private rights of a master Many families which belonged to his domus fiscales in the neighbourhood of Paris were forcibly sent away into Spain

99 Licentiam habeatis mihi qualemcumque volueritis disciplinam ponere vel venumdare aut quod vobis placuerit de me facere Marculf Formula l ii 28 in tom iv p 497 The Formula of Landenbrogius (p 559) and that of Anjou (p 565) are to the same effect Gregory of Tours (l vi c 45 in tom ii p 311) speaks of many persons who sold themselves for bread in a great famine in Cæsar [The Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romans]), yet he relates his unsuccessful siege of Gergovia with less frankness than we might expect from a great man to whom victory was familiar. He acknowledges, however, that in one attack he lost forty six centurions and seven hundred men (de Bell. Gallico, l. vi [vii] c. 44-53, in tom. 1. p. 270-272).

101. Audebant se quondam fratres Latio dicere, et sanguine ab Iliaco populos computare (Sidon. Apollinar. l. vii Epist. 7, in tom. 1. p. 799). I am not informed of the degrees and circumstances of this fabulous pedigree.

102. Either the first or second partition among the sons of Clovis had given Berry to Childebert (Greg. Turon. l. iii c. 12, in tom. ii p. 192). Velim (said he), Arvernæ Lemanem, quæ tantæ jocunditatis gratiâ refulgere dicitur, oculis cernere (l. iii c. 9, p. 191). The face of the country was concealed by a thick fog when the king of Paris made his entry into Clermont.

103. For the description of Auvergne, see Sidonius (l. iv Epist. 21, in tom. 1. p. 793), with the notes of Savaron and Sirmond (p. 279 and 51 of their respective editions). Boulainvilliers (État de la France, tom. ii p. 242-268), and the Abbé de la Longuerue (Description de la France, part. 1. p. 132-139).

104. Iurorem gentium, quæ de ulteriore Rheno amnis parte venerint, superare non poterit (Greg. Turon. l. iv c. 50, in tom. ii p. 229), was the excuse of another king of Austrasia (A. D. 574) for the ravages which his troops committed in the neighbourhood of Paris.

105. From the name and situation, the Benedictine editors of Gregory of Tours (in tom. ii p. 192) have fixed this fortress at a place named Chastel Melia, two miles from Mauriac, in the Upper Auvergne. In this description I translate infra as if I read extra: the two prepositions are perpetually confounded by Gregory or his transcribers, and the sense must always decide.

106. See these revolutions and wars of Auvergne in Gregory of Tours (l. ii c. 37, in tom. ii p. 183, and l. iii c. 12, 13 p. 191, 192, de Miraculis St. Juliani c. 13 in tom. ii p. 466). He frequently betrays his extraordinary attention to his native country.

107. The story of Attalus is related by Gregory of Tours (l. iii c. 15 in tom. ii p. 193-195). His editor the P. Ruinart confounds this Attalus who was a youth (juvenculus) in the year 532 with a friend of Sidonius of the same name who was count of Autun fifty or sixty years before. Such an error, which cannot be imputed to ignorance, is excused in some degree by its own magnitude.

108. This Gregory, the great-grandfather of Gregory of Tours (in tom. ii p. 187, 490) lived ninety-two years of which he passed forty-eight at Autun, and thirty-two as bishop of Langres. According to the poet Fortunatus he day layed equal merit in the one different stations.

Nobilis antiquâ decurrens prole parentum,
Nobilior gestis, nunc super astra manet
Arbiter ante ferox, dein pius ipse sacerdos,
Quos domuit judex, fovit amore patris

109. As M. de Valois and the P. Ruinart are determined to change the Mosella of the text into Mosa, it becomes me to acquiesce in the alteration. Yet, after some examination of the topography, I could defend the common reading.

110. The parents of Gregory (Gregorius Florentius Georgius) were of noble extraction (natalibus illustres), and they possessed large estates (latifundia) both in Auvergne and Burgundy. He was born in the year 539, was consecrated bishop of Tours in 573, and died in 593 or 595, soon after he had terminated his history. See his Life by Odo, abbot of Clugny (in tom. ii p. 129-135), and a new Life in the Mémoires de l'Académie, etc., tom. xxvi p. 508-637.

111. Decedente atque immo potius pereunte ab urbibus Gallicanis liberalium culturâ literarum, etc. (in præfat. in tom. ii p. 137), is the complaint of Gregory himself, which he fully verifies by his own work. His style is equally devoid of elegance and simplicity. In a conspicuous situation he still remained a stranger to his own age and country, and in a prolix work (the five last books contain ten years) he has omitted almost everything that posterity desires to learn. I have tediously acquired, by a painful perusal, the right of pronouncing this unfavourable sentence.

112. The Abbé de Mably (tom. 1. p. 247-267) has diligently confirmed this opinion of the President de Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws l. xxx c. 13).

113. See Dubos, Hist. Critique de la Monarchie Française, tom. ii l. vi c. 9, 10. The French antiquarians establish as a principle that the Romans and barbarians may be distinguished by their names. Their names undoubtedly form a reasonable presumption, yet, in reading Gregory of Tours I have observed Gondulphus of Senonian or Roman extraction (l. vi c. 11, in tom. ii p. 273), and Cludius, a barbarian (l. vii c. 20 p. 303).

114. Iunius Mummolus is repeatedly mentioned by Gregory of Tours, from the fourth (c. 47, p. 224) to the seventh (c. 40 p. 310) book. The computation by talents is singular enough, but if Gregory attached any meaning to that obsolete word, the treasures of Mummolus must have exceeded £100,000 sterling.

115. See Henry Duncun in sur l'Histoire Ecclesiastique.

116. The bishop of Tournai himself has recorded the complaint of Gislebert, the grandson of Charlemagne, that he remained four years without being able to read a single ecclesiastical translation, and that he remained ignorant of the Latin language (l. vi c. 46, in tom. ii p. 401).

117. See the Riparian Code (tit. xxiii in tom. ii p. 241). The same law does not permit the sale of the clergy, and we might suppose, on the

behalf of the more civilised tribe that they had not foreseen such an impious act as the murder of a priest Yet Prætextatus archbishop of Rouen was assassinated by the order of queen Fredegundis before the altar (Greg Turon I vii c 31 in tom ii p 326)

118 M Bonamy (Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom xxiv p 582-670) has ascertained the Lingua Romana Rustica which through the medium of the Romance has gradually been polished into the actual form of the French language Under the Carlovingian race the kings and nobles of France still understood the dialect of their German ancestors

119 Ce beau système a été trouvé dans les lois Montesquieu The Spirit of Laws I xi c 6

120 See the Abbé de Mably Observations etc tom I p 34-56 It should seem that the institution of national assemblies which are coeval with the French nation has never been congenial to its temper

121 Gregory of Tours (I vii c 30 in tom ii p 325-326) relates with much indifference the crimes the reproof and the apology Nullus Regem metuit nullus Ducem nullus Comitem reveretur et si fortassis alicui ista displicent et ea pro longævitate vitæ estræ emendare conatur statim seditio in populo statim tumultus exoritur et in tantum unusquisque contra seniores sævâ intentione grassatur ut vix se credat evadere si tandem aliter nequiverit

122 Spain in these dark ages has been peculiarly unfortunate The Franks had a Gregory of Tours the Saxons or Angles a Bede the Lombards a Paul Warnefrid etc But the history of the Visigoths is contained in the short and imperfect Chronicles of Isidore of Seville and John of Biclar

123 Such are the complaints of St Boniface the apostle of Germany and the reformer of Gaul (in tom iv p 94) The fourscore years which he deplores of licence and corruption would seem to insinuate that the barbarians were admitted into the clergy about the year 660

124 The acts of the councils of Toledo are still the most authentic records of the church and constitution of Spain The following passages are particularly important — in 17 18 iv 75 v 2 3 4 5 8 vi 11 12 13 14 17 18 vii 1 xiii 2 3 6 I have found Mascou (Hist of the Ancient Germans xv 29 and Annotations xxvi and xxxiii) and Ferreras (Hist Générale de l'Espagne tom ii) very useful and accurate guides

125 The Code of the Visigoths regularly divided into twelve books has been correctly published by Dom Bouquet (in tom iv p 283-460) It has been treated by the President De Montesquieu (The Spirit of Laws I xxviii c 1) with excessive severity I dislike the style I detest the superstition but I shall presume to think that the civil jurisprudence displays a more civilised and enlightened state of society than that of the Burgundians or even of the Lombards

126 See Gildas de Excidio Britanniae c 11-25 p 4-9 edit Gale Nennius Hist Britonum c 28 35-65 p 105-115 edit Gale Bede Hist Ecclesiast Gentis Anglorum I i c 12-16 p 49-53 c 22 p 58 edit Smith Chron Saxonum p 11-13 etc edit Gibson The Anglo-Saxon laws were published by Wilkins London 1731 in folio and the Leges Wallicæ by Wotton and Clarke London 1730 in folio

127 The laborious Mr Carte and the ingenious Mr Whitaker are the two modern writers in whom I am principally indebted The particular historian of Manchester embraces under that obscure title a subject almost as extensive as the general history of England

128 This incitation which may derive some countenance from the loose expressions of Gildas and Bede is framed into a regular story by Witi-kind a Saxon monk of the tenth century (see Cousin Hist de l'Empire d'Occident tom ii p 356) Rapin and even Hume have too freely used this suspicious evidence without regarding the precise and probable testimony of Nennius Interea venerunt tres Chiuuæ à Germaniâ in exilio pæm in quibus erant Hors et Hengist [c 28]

129 Nennius imputes to the Saxons the murder of three hundred British chiefs a crime not unsuitable to their savage manners But we are not obliged to believe (see Jeffrey of Monmouth I viii c 9-12) that Stonehenge is their monument which the giants had formerly transported from Africa to Ireland and which was removed to Britain by the order of Ambrosius and the art of Merlin

130 All these tribes are expressly enumerated by Bede (I i c 15 p 52 I v c 9 p 190) and though I have considered Mr Whitaker's remarks (Hist of Manchester vol ii p 538-543) I do not perceive the absurdity of supposing that the Frisians etc were mingled with the Anglo-Saxons

131 Bede has enumerated seven kings—two Saxons a Jute and four Angles—who successively acquired in the heptarchy an indefinite supremacy of power and renown But their reign was the effect not of law but of conquest and he observes, in similar terms that one of them subdued the Isles of Man and Anglesey and that another imposed a tribute on the Scots and Picts (Hist Eccles I ii c 5 p 83)

132 See Gildas de Excidio Britanniae c. l. p. I edit Gale

133 Mr Whitaker (History of Manchester vol ii p 503 516) has smartly exposed this glaring absurdity which had passed unnoticed by the general historians as they were hastening to more interesting and important events

134 At Beranburig or Barbury castle near Marlborough The Saxon Chronicle assigns the name and date Camden (Britannia vol i p 128) ascertains the place and Henry of Huntingdon (Scriptores post Bedam p 314) relates the circumstances of this battle They are probable and char acteristic, and the historians of the twelfth century might consult some materials that no longer exist

135 Cornwall was finally subdued by Athelstan (A D 927-941), who planted an English colony at Exeter, and confined the Britons beyond the river Tamar See William of Malmesbury, l ii in the Scriptores post Bedam, p 50 The spirit of the Cornish knights was degraded by servitude and it should seem, from the romance of Sir Iristram, that their cowardice was almost proverbial

136 The establishment of the Britons in Gaul is proved in the sixth century by Procopius [Bell Goth iv 20], Gregory of Tours, the second council of Tours (A D 567), and the first suspicious of their chronicles and lives of saints The subscription of a bishop of the Britons to the first council of Tours (A D 461, or rather 481), the army of Riothamus, and the loose declamation of Gildas (in transmigras petebant regiones, c 25, p 8), may countenance an emigration as early as the middle of the fifth century Beyond that era the Britons of Armorica can be found only in romance and I am surprised that Mr Whitaker (Genuine History of the Britons, p 214-221) should so faithfully transcribe the gross ignorance of Carte, whose venial errors he has so rigorously chastised

137 The antiquities of Britagne, which have been the subject even of political controversy, are illustrated by Hydria Valesius (Nouveau Gillart, sub voce Britannia Cismarina, p 98-100), M d'Anville (Notice de l'Ancienne Gaule, Conspectus, Curiosities, Ossibus, Vorganum, p 248, 258, 308, 720, and Lints de l'Europe, p 76-80), Longueue (Description de la France tom 1 p 84-94), and the Abbé de Vertot (Hist Critique de l'Etablissement des Bretons dans les Gaules, 2 vols in 12mo Paris 1720) I may assume the merit of examining the original evidence which they have produced

138 Bede, who in his chronicle (p 28) places Ambrosius under the reign of Æno (A D 474-491), observes that his parents had been purpura in diti which he explains, in his ecclesiastical history, by 'regium nomen et insigne serenitatis' (l i c 16, p 53) The expression of Vennius (c 44 p 110, edit Gale) is still more singular Unus de consuetis gentis Romanorum est pater meus

139 By the unanimous though doubtful conjecture of our antiquarians Ambrosius is confounded with Natanleod who (A D 501) lost his own life and five thousand of his subjects in a battle against Cerdic the West Saxon (Chron Saxon p 17, 18)

140 As I am a stranger to the Welsh bard Myrddin, Llewarch and Idris in my faith in the existence and exploits of Arthur prince, relies on the simple and curious stanza (tom i of Vennius (Hist Brit c 62 63 p 114) Mr Whitaker (Hist of Manchest c 2 vol ii p 31-32) has framed an interesting and even probable narrative of the story of Arthur the rest is superfluous to allow the reality of the tradition

141 The progress of romance and the state of learning in the middle ages are illustrated by Mr Thomas Warton, with the taste of a poet and the minute diligence of an antiquarian I have derived much instruction from the two learned dissertations prefixed to the first volume of his History of English Poetry

142 Hoc anno (490) Ælla et Cissa obsederunt Andredes Ceaster, et interfecerunt omnes qui id incolerent, adeo ut ne unus Brito ibi superstes fuerit (Chron Saxon p 15), an expression more dreadful in its simplicity than all the vague and tedious lamentations of the British Jeremiahs

143 Andredes Ceaster, or Anderida, is placed by Camden (Britannia, vol 1 p 258) at Newenden, in the marshy grounds of Kent, which might be formerly covered by the sea, and on the edge of the great forest (Anderida) which overspread so large a portion of Hampshire and Sussex

144 Dr Johnson affirms that few English words are of British extraction Mr Whitaker, who understands the British language, has discovered more than three thousand, and actually produces a long and various catalogue (vol ii p 235-329) It is possible indeed, that many of these words may have been imported from the Latin or Saxon into the native idiom of Britain

145 In the beginning of the seventh century the Franks and the Anglo-Saxons mutually understood each other's language, which was derived from the same Teutonic root (Bede l i c 25, p 60)

146 After the first generation of Italian or Scottish missionaries, the dignities of the church were filled with Saxon proselytes

147 Carte's History of England vol 1 p 109, He quotes the British historians but I much fear that Jeffrey of Monmouth (l vi c 15) is his only witness

148 Bede, Hist Ecclesiar l i c 15 p 52 The fact is probable and well attested yet such was the loose intermixture of the German tribes that we find, in a subsequent period, the law of the Angli and Wanni of Germany (Lindembro Carles p 470-480)

149 See Dr Henry's useful and laborious History of Great Britain vol ii p 323

150 Quinceid (sax John of Tinemouth) inter Tynam et Isam fluxus exitus solus erat vastitudo tunc temporis fuit et ibi nec nullum ditionem servavit, eo quod sola indomitorum et silvorum animalium spelunca et habitatio fuit (apud Carte vol 1 p 103) From Pol up Nicholson English Historical Library, p 15 67 I understand the fair copies of John of Tinemouth this simple collection is preserved in the library of Oxford Lambeth etc

151 See the edition of Willelm etc in Peto's Hist Brit l i c 18 ff p 153 154 155

152 In the second volume of Bede (l i c 1 p 52) and Willelm's History (l i c 1 p 15) it appears that the Anglo-Saxons from the first to the last age persisted in this unnatural practice Their youths were publicly sold in the market of Rome

153 According to the laws of Ina they could not be lawfully sold beyond the seas

154 The life of a Wallas or Cambrius homo who possessed a hyde of land is fixed at 120 shillings by the same laws (of Ina tit xxxi in Leg Anglo-Saxon p 20) which allowed 200 shillings for a free Saxon and 1200 for a Thane (see likewise Leg Anglo-Saxon p 71) We may observe that these legislators the West Saxons and Mercians continued their British conquests after they became Christians The laws of the four kings of Kent do not condescend to notice the existence of any subject Britons

155 See Carte's Hist of England vol i p 278

156 At the conclusion of his history (A D 731) Bede describes the ecclesiastical state of the island and censures the implacable though impotent hatred of the Britons against the English nation and the catholic church (l v c 23 p 219)

157 Mr Pennant's Tour in Wales (p 426-449) has furnished me with a curious and interesting account of the Welsh bards In the year 1568 a session was held at Caerwys by the special command of queen Elizabeth and regular degrees in vocal and instrumental music were conferred on fifty five minstrels The prize (a silver harp) was adjudged by the Mostyn family

158 Regio longe lateque diffusa mille magis quam credibile sit referta Partibus equidem in illis miles unus quinquaginta generat sortitus more barbaro denas aut amplius uxorcs This reproach of William of Poitiers (in the Historians of France tom xi p 88) is disclaimed by the Benedictine editors

159 Giraldus Cambrensis confines this gift of bold and ready eloquence to the Romans the French and the Britons The malicious Welshman insinuates that the English taciturnity must possibly be the effect of their servitude under the Normans

160 The picture of Welsh and Armorican manners is drawn from Giraldus (Descript Cambriae c 6-15 inter Script Camden p 886-891) and the authors quoted by the Abbé de Vertot (Hist Critique tom ii p 259-266)

161 See Procopius de Bell Gothie l iv p 20 p 620-625 [ed Paris tom ii p 559 199 ed Bonn] The Greek historian is himself so confounded by the wonders which he relates that he weakly attempts to distinguish the islands of Britha and Britann which he has identified by so many inseparable circumstances

162 Theodebert grandson of Clovis and king of Austrasia was the most powerful and warlike prince of the age and this remarkable adventure may be placed between the years 534 and 547 the extreme terms of his reign His sister Theudechildis retired to Sens where she founded monasteries and distributed alms (see the notes of the Benedictine editors in tom ii p 216) If we may credit the praises of Fortunatus (l vi carm 5 in tom ii p 507) Radiger was deprived of a most valuable wife

163 Perhaps she was the sister of one of the princes or chiefs of the Angles who landed in 527 and the following years between the Humber and the Thames and gradually founded the kingdoms of East Anglia and Mercia The English writers are ignorant of her name and existence but Procopius may have suggested to Mr Rowe the character and situation of Rodogune in the tragedy of the Royal Convert

164 In the copious history of Gregory of Tours we cannot find any traces of hostile or friendly intercourse between France and England except in the marriage of the daughter of Caribert king of Paris quam in Cantia regis cujusdam filius matrimonio copulavit (l ix c 26 in tom ii p 348) The bishop of Tours ended his history and his life almost immediately before the conversion of Kent

General Observations

1 Such are the figurative expressions of Plutarch (Opera tom ii p 318 edit Wechel [Frankf 1620]) to whom on the faith of his son Lamprinus (Fabricius Bibliot Græc tom iii p 341) I shall boldly impute the malicious declamation repl res Populæ uxorcs The same opinions had prevailed among the Greeks two hundred and fifty years before Plutarch and to confute them is the professed intention of Polybius (Hist l i c 63) p 90 edit Gronov Amstel 1670)

2 See the inestimable remains of the sixth book of Polybius and many other parts of his general history particularly a digression in the seventh book (l xviii c 12-15) in which he compares the phalanx and the legion

3 Sallust de Bell Jugurthin c 4 Such were the generous professions of P Scipio and Q Maximus The Latin historian had read and most probably transcribes Polybius their contemporary and friend

4 While Carthage was in flames Scipio repeated two lines of the Iliad which express the destruction of Troy acknowledging to Polybius his friend and preceptor (Polyb [Fragm l xxxv sub fin] in Excerpt de Virtut et Vit tom ii p 1455-1465) that while he recollected the vicissitudes of human affairs he inwardly applied them to the future calamities of Rome (Appian in Libyis [l viii c 132] p 156 edit Toll)

5 See Daniel ii 31-40 And the fourth king dom shall be strong as iron, forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things" The remainder of the prophecy (the mixture of iron and clay) was accomplished, according to St. Jerome, in his own time. Sicut enim in principio nihil Romano Imperio fortius et durius, ita in fine rerum nihil imbecillius quum et in bellis civilibus et adversus diversas nationes, aliarum gentium barbararum auxilio indigemus (Opera, tom v p 572)

5 The French and English editors of the General History of the Tartars have subjoined a curious, though imperfect, description of their present state. We might question the independence of the Calmucks, or Eluths, since they have been recently vanquished by the Chinese, who, in the year 1759, subdued the lesser Bucharina, and advanced into the country of Badakshan, near the sources of the Oxus (Mémoires sur les Chinois, tom i p 325-400) But these conquests are precarious, nor will I venture to ensure the safety of the Chinese empire

7 The prudent reader will determine how far this general proposition is weakened by the revolt of the Isaurians, the independence of Britain and Armonica, the Moorish tribes, or the Bagaudæ of Gaul and Spain (vol i p 414, vol iv pp 130, 178, 252)

8 America now contains about six millions of European blood and descent and their numbers, at least in the North, are continually increasing. Whatever may be the changes of their political situation, they must preserve the manners of Europe and we may reflect with some pleasure that the English language will probably be diffused over an immense and populous continent

9 On avoit fait venir (for the siege of Turin) 140 pièces de canon et il est à remarquer que chaque gros canon monté revient à environ 2000 écus il y avoit 100,000 boulets 106,000 cartouches d'une façon et 300,000 d'une autre 21,000 bombes, 27,700 grenades, 15,000 sacs à terre 30,000 instruments pour le pionnage 1,200,000 livres de poudre. Ajoutez à ces munitions le plomb, le fer et le fer blanc, les cordons, tout ce qui sert aux mineurs le soufre, le salpêtre les outils de tout espèce. Il est certain que les frus de tous ces préparatifs de destruction suffiroient pour fonder et pour faire fleurir la plus nombreuse colonie. Voltaire, Siècle de Louis XIV c. xx. in his Works, tom xi p 391

10 It would be an easy, though tedious, task to produce the authorities of poets, philosophers, and historians. I shall therefore content myself with appealing to the decisive and authentic testimony of Diodorus Siculus (tom i l i p 11, 12, l iii [c. 14 sqq] p 184, etc., edit Wesseling) The Ichthyophagi, who in his time wandered along the shores of the Red Sea, can only be compared to the natives of New Holland (Dampier's Voyages, vol i p 464-469) Fancy, or perhaps reason, may still suppose an extreme and absolute state of nature far below the level of these savages, who had acquired some arts and instruments

11 See the learned and rational work of the President Goguet, de l'Origine des Loix, des Arts, et des Sciences. He traces from facts or conjectures (tom i p 147-337, edit 12mo) the first and most difficult steps of human invention

12 It is certain, however strange, that many nations have been ignorant of the use of fire. Even the ingenious natives of Otaheite, who are destitute of metals, have not invented any earthen vessels capable of sustaining the action of fire and of communicating the heat to the liquids which they contain

13 Plutarch Quest Rom in tom ii p 275 [tom vii p 112, ed Reiske] Macrobius Saturnal. l i c 7, p 152, edit London. The arrival of Saturn (of his religious worship) in a ship may indicate that the savage coast of Latium was first discovered and civilised by the Phœnicians

14 In the ninth and tenth books of the Odyssey, Homer has embellished the tales of fearful and credulous sailors who transformed the cannibals of Italy and Sicily into monstrous giants

15 The merit of discovery has too often been stained with avarice, cruelty, and fanaticism and the intercourse of nations has produced the communication of disease and prejudice. A singular exception is due to the virtue of our own times and country. The five great voyages, successively undertaken by the command of his present Majesty, were inspired by the pure and generous love of science and mankind. The same prince adapting his beneficence to the different states of society, has founded a school of painting in his capital, and has introduced into the islands of the South Sea the vegetables and animals most useful to human life.

Chapter XXXIX

11. Jernander (de Rebus Græcis c. 13. 14. p. 629, 630, edit Curt.) has drawn the portrait of Theodorus from Cypri, one of the four et Demetrius, who lived about the time of Demetrius Carystodorus, the first who called the general name of the Arabs (Vitarum l. 5. in 25. x. 2. xi. 1) includes the grandson of Theodorus as the author descent. For several of the Swedish commentators of Cæsar's Vit. Theodorus p. 271 etc. and Holmström labours to connect it a general or with the Demetrius tradition and the Demetrius

2. More exactly the same as the Demetrius (Vitarum l. 5. in 25. x. 2. xi. 1) and the same as the Demetrius (Vitarum l. 5. in 25. x. 2. xi. 1)

Meditations (Jornandes = 52 p 689 Severin Pannonia Illustrata p 22 Cellarius Geograph Antiq tom 1 p 350)

3 The four first letters of his name (ΘΕΟΔ) were inscribed on a gold plate and when it was fixed on the paper the king drew his pen through the intervals (Anonym Valesian ad calcem Amm Marcellin p 722 [tom II p 313 ed Bignon]) This authentic fact with the testimony of Procopius or at least of the contemporary Goths (Gothic I i c 2 p 312 [ed Paris tom II p 14 ed Bonn]) far outweighs the vague praises of Ennodius (Sirmond Opera tom I p 1596) and Theophanes (Chronograph p 112 [ed Par p 202 203 ed Bonn])

4 Statura est quæ resignet proceritate regnare (Ennodius p 1614) The bishop of Pavia (I mean the ecclesiastic who wished to be a bishop) then proceeds to celebrate the complexion eyes hands etc of his sovereign

5 The state of the Ostrogoths and the first years of Theodoric are found in Jornandes (c 52-56 II 689-696) and Malchus (Excerpt Legat II 78-80 [ed Par II 244-248 ed Bonn]) who erroneously styles him the son of Valamir

6 Theophanes (p 111 [p 200 ed Bonn]) in sends a copy of her sacred letters to the provinces τοῖς ἐν τῷ βασιλείῳ ἡμετέρῳ καὶ αὐτῷ προχρησάμεθα βασιλίστα Τρασκάλλοι etc Such female pretensions would have astonished the slaves of the first Caesars

9 The contemporary histories of Malchus and Candidus are lost but some extracts or fragments have been saved by Photius (lxxviii lxxix p 100-102 [p 34-35 ed Bekk]) Constantine Porphyrogenitus (Excerpt Leg p 78-97) and in various articles of the Lexicon of Suidas The Chronicles of Marcellinus (Imago Historiae) are originals for the reigns of Zeno and Anastasius and I must acknowledge almost for the last time my obligations to the large and accurate collections of Tillemont (Hist des Emp tom VI p 472-65)

10 In ipsa congressionis tunc foribus cessat in vasor cum profugo per te sceptrum redderetur de salute dubitanti Ennodius then proceeds (p 1596 1597 tom I Sirmond) to transport his hero (on a flying dragon?) into Aethiopia beyond the tropic of Cancer The evidence of the Valesian Fragment (p 717) Liberatus (Brev Eutyth c 25 p 118) and Theophanes (p 111 [p 203 ed Bonn]) is more sober and rational

11 This cruel practice is specially imputed to the Triarian Goths less barbarous as it should seem than the Valamirs but the son of Theodemir is charged with the ruin of many Roman cities (Malchus Excerpt Leg p 95 [ed Par p 238 ed Bonn])

12 Jornandes (c 56 57 p 697) displays the services of Theodoric confesses his rewards but dissembles his revolt of which such curious details have been preserved by Malchus (Excerpt Legat II 78-97 [p 244 299 ed Bonn]) Marcellinus a domestic of Justinian under whose ivth consulship (A D 534) he composed his Chronicle (Scaliger Thesaurus Temporum P II p 34-57) betrays his prejudice and passion in [apud] Græciam debacclat antem Zenonis munificentiam pene paratam beneficis nunquam satiat etc [p 368 369 and 370 ed Sirmond]

13 As he was riding in his own camp an unruly horse threw him against the point of a spear which hung before a tent or was fixed on a waggon (Marcellin in Chron Evagrius I III c 25)

14 See Malchus (p 91 [ed Par II 268 ed Bonn]) and Evagrius (I III c 35)

15 Malchus p 85 [p 256 ed Bonn] In a single action which was decided by the skill and discipline of Sabinian, Theodoric could lose 3000 men

16 Jornandes (c 57 p 696 697) has abridged the great history of Cassiodorus See compare and reconcile Procopius (Gothic I i c 1) the Valesian Fragment (p 718 [ad Calcem Amm Marcellin tom II p 306 ed Bignon]) Theophanes (p 113 [p 203 ed Bonn]) and Marcellinus (in Chron)

17 Theodoric's march is supplied and illustrated by Ennodius (p 1598-1602) when the bombast of the oration is translated into the language of common sense

18 Tot reges etc (Ennodius p 1602) We must recollect how much the royal title was multiplied and degraded and that the mercenaries of Italy were the fragments of many tribes and nations

19 See Ennodius p 1603 1604 Since the orator in the king's presence could mention and praise his mother we may conclude that the magnanimity of Theodoric was not hurt by the vulgar reproaches of concubine and bastard

20 This anecdote is related on the modern but respectable authority of Sigonius (Op tom I p 580 De Occident Imp I xv) his words are curious — Would you return? etc She presented and almost displayed the original recess

21 Hist Miscell I xv a Roman history from Janus to the ninth century an Epitome of Eutropius Paulus Diaconus and Theophanes which Muratori has published from a MS in the Ambrosian library (Script Rerum Italicarum tom I p 100)

22 Procopius (Gothic I i c 1) approves himself an impartial sceptic φασι βολερω τρέφει [tom II p 10 ed Bonn] Cassiodorus (in Chron) and Ennodius (p 1605) are loyal and credulous and the testimony of the Valesian Fragment (p 718 [Amm tom II p 307 ed Bignon]) may justify their belief Marcellinus spits the venom of a Greek subject — perjuris illectus interfectusque est (in Chron [anno 489])

23 The sonorous and servile oration of Ennodius was pronounced at Milan or Ravenna in the years 507 or 508 (Sirmond, tom 2 p 1615) Two or three years afterwards the orator was rewarded with the bishopric of Pavî, which he held till his death in the year 521 (Dupin, Bibliot. Eccles. tom v p 11-14. See Saxii Onomasticon, tom ii p 12)

24. Our best materials are occasional hints from Procopius and the Valesian Fragment, which was discovered by Sirmond and is published at the end of Ammianus Marcellinus. The author's name is unknown, and his style is barbarous, but in his various facts he exhibits the knowledge, without the passions, of a contemporary. The President Montesquieu had formed the plan of a history of Theodoric, which at a distance might appear a rich and interesting subject.

25 The best edition of the Variorum Libri xii is that of Joh Garretius (Rotomagi 1679, in Opp. Cassiodor 2 vols in fol.), but they deserved and required such an editor as the Marquis Scipio Maffei, who thought of publishing them at Verona. The Barbara Eleganza (as it is ingeniously named by Tiraboschi) is never simple, and seldom perspicuous.

26 Procopius, Gothic 11 c 3, Variarum, II
Maffei (Verona Illustrat., P. 1 p 228) exaggerates the injustice of the Goths, whom he hated as an Italian noble The plebeian Muratori crouches under their oppression

27 Procopius, Goths I iii c. 4 and 21 (tom II p 295 and 366, ed Bonn) Ennodius describes (p 1612, 1613) the military arts and increasing numbers of the Goths.

28 When Theodoric gave his sister to the king of the Vandals she sailed for Africa with a guard of 1000 noble Goths, each of whom was attended by five armed followers (Procop. Vandal. I c 8 (tom 1 p 346 ed Bonn)). The Gothic nobility must have been as numerous as brave

29 See the acknowledgment of Gothic liberty (Var V 30)

30 Procopius Goth 1 l. c. 2 (tom ii p 14, ed Bonn) The Roman boys learnt the language (Ar viii 21) of the Goths. Their general ignorance is not destroyed by the exceptions of Amalsuintha, a female, who might study without shame, or of Theodisus whose learning provoked the indignation and contempt of his countrymen.

31. A saying of Theodoric was founded on experience: "Romanus in se imitatur Gothum et utilis (de se) Gothum imitatur Romanum." See the Fragment and Notes of Valerius p. 719 [Armin II. p. 303 ed. Bip.]

32 The view of the military establishment of the Goths in Italy is collected from the Epitomes of Cassiodorus (Var. 1. 24. 40 in 3. 24. 4th in 3. 14. 1. 26. 27. viii. 3. 4. 2.). They are illustrated in the Journal Moscou (Hist. of the Germans. L. xi. 46-44. Annotation vi.)

31. See the citations and views of the non-Alia turn in Intervius (p. 167) and Cantabrigia (Var

ferent styles of friendship, counsel, expostulation, etc

34. Even of his table (Vr vi 9) and palace (vii 5) The admiration of strangers is represented as the most rational motive to justify these vain expenses, and to stimulate the diligence of the officers to whom these provinces were intrusted

35 See the public and private alliances of the Gothic monarch, with the Burgundians (Var. 45, 46), with the Franks (ii 40), with the Thuringians (ii 1), and with the Vandals (i 1), each of these epistles affords some curious knowledge of the policy and manners of the barbarians.

36 His political system may be observed in Cassiodorus (Var iv 1, ix 1), Jordanes (c. 58, p. 698, 699), and the Valesian Fragment (p. 720, 721 [Amm. tom ii p. 311, ed. Bip]). Peace, honourable peace, was the constant aim of Theodoric.

37 The curious reader may contemplate the Heruli of Procopius (Goth. l. ii. c. 14), and the patient reader may plunge into the dark and minute researches of M. de Buat (Hist. des Peuples Anciens, tom. ix. p. 348-306).

38 Variarum, i. 2 The spirit and forms of this martial institution are noticed by Cassiodorus, but he seems to have only translated the sentiments of the Gothic king into the language of Roman eloquence

39 Cassiodorus, who quotes Tacitus to the Asturs, the unlettered savages of the Baltic (Ar 2), describes the amber for which their shores have ever been famous as the gum of a tree hardened by the sun and purified and washed by the waves.
When that singular substance is analysed by the chemists, it yields a vegetable oil and a mineral acid

40 Scanzia, or Thule, is described by Jornandes (c. 3, p. 610-613) and Procopius (Goth. I. ii. c. 13). Neither the Goth nor the Greek had visited the country, both had conversed with the natives in their exile at Ravenna or Constantinople.

41 Sapimus feller. In the time of Jernander they inhabited Sethoo, the proper Sweden but that beautiful race of animals has gradually been driven into the eastern parts of Siberia. See Buffon (Hist Nat tom xiii p 309 313 quarto edn in) Pennant (System of Quadrupeds vol 1 p 377-38) Gmelin (Hist Gen des Voyages tom xi ii p 27 258) and Levesque (Hist de Russie tom i p 165, 166 314 315).

42 In the system of rotation of M. Lailly (Lectures in the Sciences of the Atlantic, tome I, p. 249-250, tom II, p. 249) the place of the Elda and the annual death and revival of Adonis and Osiris are the effects of variations of the altitude of the position of the sun in the Arctic region. It is then rather curious to have some of the great Platonists, as it can be seen from the fragments, to be of the opinion of the opposite.

52 Procopius affirms that no laws whatsoever were promulgated by Theodoric and the succeeding kings of Italy (Goth l ii c 6 [tom ii p 170 ed Bonn]) He must mean in the Gothic language A Latin ed ct of Theodoric is still extant in one hundred and fifty four articles

53 The image of Theodoric is engraved on his coins his modest successors were satisfied with adding their own name to the head of the reigning emperor (Muratori Antiquitat Italix Medii Aevi tom ii dissert xxvii p 577-579 Giannone Istoria Civile di Napoli tom. i. p 166)

54 The alliance of the emperor and the king of Italy are represented by Cassiodorus (Var i i ii 1 2 3 vi 1) and Procopius (Goth. l. ii c 6 l iii

c. 21 [tom. ii p 369 ed Bonn]) who celebrate the friendship of Anastasius and Theodoric but the figurative style of compliment was interpreted in a very different sense at Constantinople and Ravenna

55 To the seventeen provinces of the Notitia Paul Warnefrid the deacon (De Reb Longobard l ii c 14-22) has subjoined an eighteenth the Apennine (Muratori Script Rerum Italicarum, tom. i. p 431-433) But of these Sardinia and Corsica were possessed by the Vandals and the two Rhetias as well as the Cottian Alps seem to have been abandoned to a military government. The state of the four provinces that now form the kingdom of Naples is laboured by Giannone (tom i p 172 178) with patriotic diligence

56 See the Gothic history of Procopius (l. i. c. 1 l. ii c 6) the Epistles of Cassiodorus (passim but especially the fifth and sixth books [vi and vii] which contain the formulae or patents of offices) and the Civil History of Giannone (tom. i l. ii iii) The Gothic counts which he places in every Italian city are annihilated however by Maffei (Verona Illustrata P i l viii. p 227) for those of Syracuse and Naples (Var vi 22 23) were special and temporary commissions

57 Two Italians of the name of Cassiodorus, the father (Var i 24 [4] 40) and the son (ix 24 25) were successively employed in the administration of Theodoric. The son was born in the year 479 his various epistles as quaestor master of the offices and Praetorian prefect extend from 509 to 539 and he lived as a monk about thirty years. 63 Cassiodorus describes in his pompous style the Forum of Trajan (Var vi 6) the theatre of Marcellus (iv 51) and the amphitheatre of Titus (v 42) and his descriptions are not unworthy of the reader's perusal According to the modern prices the Abbé Barthelemy computes that the brickwork and masonry of the Coliseum would now cost twenty millions of French livres (Mém de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom xviii p 585, 586) How small a part of that stupendous fabric!

64. For the aqueducts and cloacae see Strabo (I v p 360 [p 235, ed. Casaub.]), Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvi 24 [§ 31]), Cassiodorus (Var. iii 30, 31, vi 6), Procopius (Goth. I i c 19), and Nardini (Roma Antica, p. 514-522). How such works could be executed by a king of Rome is yet a problem.

65 For the Gothic care of the buildings and statues, see Cassiodorus (Var. 1.21, 25, n.34, n.30, vii.6, 13, 15), and the Valesian Fragment (p.721 [Amm. tom. n. p.310, ed. Bip.])

66 Var. vii 15 These horses of Monte Cavallo had been transported from Alexandria to the baths of Constantine (Nardini, p 188) Their sculpture is disdained by the Abbé Dubos (Réflexions sur la Poésie et sur la Peinture, tom 1 section 39), and admired by Winckelman (Hist de l'Art, tom II p 159)

70 His affection for that city is proved by the epithet of "Verona tua," and the legend of the hero under the barbarous name of Dietrich of Bern (Petringseld ad Cochitum, p. 240), Maffei traces him with knowledge and pleasure in his native country (l. ix p. 230-236).

71 See Maffei (Verona Illustrata Part i p 231, 232, 308, etc.) He imputes Gothic architecture, like the corruption of language, writings, etc., not to the barbarians, but to the Italians themselves. Compare his sentiments with those of Tirabocchi (tom iii p 61).

72. The villas, climate and landscape of Naïre (Var ix 6 see Clavier Italia Antiq I v c 2, p. 1119 etc.) Istria (Var xii 27 2b), and Comum (Var xi 14, compare with Iliac two villas ix 7), are agreeably painted in the epistles of Catullus.

79 The tolerating system of his reign (Ennodius, p 1612, Anonym Vales p 719 [p 308, ed Bip]), Procop Goth 1 i c. 1, 1 i c. 6) may be studied in the Epistles of Cassiodorus, under the following heads: bishops (Var 1 q viii 15 24 iv 23) monasteries (1 26 ii 20 30), church lands (iv 17, 20), secularies (ii 18, iii 47), church plate (xii 20) discipline (iv 44), which prove at the same time that he was the head of the church as well as of the state.

91 The Athenian studies of Boethius are doubtful (Baronius A.D. 510 No 3 from a spurious tract De Disciplina Scholarum) and the term of eighteen years is doubtless too long but the simple fact of a visit to Athens is justified by much internal evidence (Brucker Hist Crit Philosoph tom iii p 524-527) and by an expression (though vague and ambiguous) of his friend Cassiodorus (Var i 45), longe postas Athenas introisti

92 Bibliothecae comptos ebore ac vitro parietes etc (Consol Phil l i pros v p 74) The Epistles of Ennodius (vi ii vii 13 viii 1 31 37 40) and Cassiodorus (Var l 39 iv 6 ix 21) afford many proofs of the high reputation which he enjoyed in his own times It is true that the bishop of Pavia wanted to purchase of him an old house at Milan and praise might be tendered and accepted in part of payment

93 Pagii Muratori etc are agreed that Boethius himself was consul in the year 510 his two sons in 522 and in 487 perhaps his father A desire of ascribing the last of these consulships to the philosopher had perplexed the chronology of his life In his honours allitances children he celebrates his own felicity—his past felicity (p 109 110)

94 Si ego scirem tu i c cisses Boethius adopts this answer (l i pros 4 p 53) of Julius Cæsar whose philosophic death is described by Seneca (De Tranquillitate Animi c 14)

95 The characters of his two delators Basilus (Var ii 10 11 iv 22) and Opilio (v 41 viii 16) are illustrated not much to their honour in the Epistles of Cassiodorus which likewise mention Decoratus (v 31) the worthless colleague of Boethius (l iii pros 4 p 193)

96 A severe inquiry was instituted into the crime of magic (Var iv 22 23 ix 18) and it was believed that many necromancers had escaped by making their gaolers mad for mad I should read drunk

97 Boethius had composed his own Apology (p 53) perhaps more interesting than his Consolation We must be content with the general view of his honours principles persecution etc (l i pros 4 p 42-62) which may be compared with the short and weighty words of the Valesian Fragment (p 723 [Amm tom ii p 314 ed Bip]) An anonymous writer [Sinner Catalog MSS Bibliot Bern tom i p 287] charges him home with honourable and patriotic treason

98 He was executed in Agro Calventiano (Calventano between Margnano and Pavia) Anonym Vales p 723 [p 315 ed Bip] by order of Eusebius count of Ticinum or Pavia The place of his confinement is styled the baptistry an edifice and name peculiar to cathedrals It is claimed by the perpetual tradition of the church of Pavia The tower of Boethius subsisted till the year 1584 and the draught is yet preserved (Tiraboschi tom iii p 47 48)

99 See the Biographia Britannica ALFRED tom i p 80 2nd edition The work is still more honourable if performed under the learned eye of Alfred by his foreign and domestic doctors For the reputation of Boethius in the middle ages consult Brucker (Hist Crit Philosoph tom iii p 565 566)

100 The inscription on his new tomb was composed by the preceptor of Otho the Third the learned pope Silvester II who like Boethius himself was styled a magician by the ignorance of the times The catholic martyr had carried his head in his hands a considerable way (Baronius A.D. 526 No 17 18) yet on a similar tale a lady of my acquaintance once observed La distance n'y fait rien il n'y a que le premier pas qui coûte

101 Boethius applauds the virtues of his father in law (l i pros 4 p 59 l ii pros 4 p 118) Procopius (Goth l i c 1 [tom ii p 11 ed Bonn]) the Valesian Fragment (p 724 [p 316 ed Bip]) and the Historia Miscella (l xv p 105 [103]) agree in praising the superior innocence or sanctity of Symmachus and in the estimation of the legend the guilt of his murder is equal to the imprisonment of a pope

102 In the fanciful eloquence of Cassiodorus the variety of sea and river fish are an evidence of extensive dominion and those of the Rhine of Sicily and of the Danube were served on the

278) Their religion an honourable problem be trays occasional conformity with a secret attachment to Paganism and Philosophy

13 In the seven first books two Persian two Vandalic and three Gothic Procopius has borrowed from Appian the division of provinces and wars the eighth book though it bears the name of Gothic is a miscellaneous and general supplement down to the spring of the year 553 from whence it is continued by Agathias till 559 (Page Critica A D 579 No 5)

14. The literary fate of Procopius has been somewhat unlucky 1 His books de Bello Gothico were stolen by Leonard Aretin and published (Fulginu 1470 Venet 1471 apud Janson Mattiare Annal Typograph tom 1 edit posterior p 290 304 279 290) in his own name (see Vossius de Hist Lat 1 iii = 5 and the feeble defence of the Venice Giornale de Letterati tom xix p 207) 2 His works were mutilated by the first Latin translators Christopher Persona (Giornale tom xiv p 340-348) and Raphael de Volaterra (Huet de Claris Interpretibus p 166) who did not even consult the MS of the Vatican library of which they were præfects (Aleman in Præfat Anecdote) 3 The Greek text was not printed till 1607 by Hoeschelius of Augsburg (Dictionnaire de Bayle tom ii p 782) 4 The Paris edition was imperfectly executed by Claude Maltret a Jesuit of Toulouse (in 1663) far distant from the Louvre press and the Vatican MS from which however he obtained some supplements His promised commentaries etc have never appeared The Agathias of Leyden (1594) has been wisely reprinted by the Paris editor with the Latin version of Bonaventura Vulcanius a learned interpreter (Huet p 176)

15 Agathias in Præfat p 78 l iv p 136 [ed Par p 11 264 ed Bonn] Evagrius l iv c 12 See likewise Photius cod lxxi p 65 [p 21 ed Bekk]

16 Kôpo παιδα (says he Præfat ad l de Adificiis repl τὴν αὐτὴν) is no more than Kôp v παιδα—a pun! In these five books Procopius affects a Christian as well as a courtly style

17 Procopius discloses himself (Præfat ad Anecdote c 1 2 5) and the anecdotes are reckoned as the ninth book by Suidas (tom iii p 186 ed Kuster) The silence of Evagrius is a poor objection Baronius (A D 548 No 24) regrets the loss of this secret history it was then in the Vatican library in his own custody and was first published sixteen years after his death with the learned but partial notes of Nicholas Alemannus (Lugd 1623)

18 Justinian an ass—the perfect likeness of Domitian—Anecdote = 8—Theodora's lovers driven from her bed by rival demons—her marriage foretold with a great demon—a monk saw the prince of the demons instead of Justinian on the throne—the servants who watched beheld a face without features a body walking without a head etc etc

Procopius declares his own and his friends belief in these diabolical stories (c 12)

19 Montesquieu (Considérations sur le Grandeur et la Décadence des Romains = xx) gives credit to these anecdotes as connected 1 with the weakness of the empire and 2 with the instability of Justinian's laws

20 For the life and manners of the empress Theodora see the Anecdotes more especially c 1-5 9 10-15 16 17 with the learned notes of Alemannus—a reference which is always implied

21 Comito was afterwards married to Sittas duke of Armenia the father perhaps at least she might be the mother of the empress Sophia Two nephews of Theodora may be the sons of Anastasia (Aleman p 30 31)

22 Her statue was raised at Constantinople on a porphyry column See Procopius (de Edif l i c 11) who gives her portrait in the Anecdotes (c 10 [tom iii p 69 ed Bonn]) Aleman (p 47) produces one from a mosaic at Ravenna loaded with pearls and jewels and yet handsome

23 A fragment of the Anecdotes (c 9) some what too naked was suppressed by Alemannus though extant in the Vatican MS nor has the defect been supplied in the Paris or Venice editions La Mothe le Vayer (tom viii p 155) gave the first hint of this curious and genuine passage (Jortin's Remarks vol iv p 366) which he had received from Rome and it has been since published in the Menagiana (tom iii p 254-259) with a Latin version

24 After the mention of a narrow girdle (as none could appear stark naked in the theatre) Procopius thus proceeds ἀπεσπικνιά τν ι τῷ ἔξ φ ι κνρία ἡ το ὅθ ι δὲ times κρ θ ι αὐτῇ διαρθ των αἰδωλῶ ἡβρίτου αἰ δὲ οἱ χνριε οἱ ἐι τούτο παρσικ αμνινοῦντῶνχαν ν ι τῶταμοι ἐνδὶατε α δ μαν ἐκωλῶν θοθιο ἡ have heard that a learned prelate now deceased was fond of quoting this passage in conversation

25 Theodora surpassed the Crispa of Ausonius (Epigram lxxi) who imitated the capitalis luxus of the females of Nola See Quintilian Institut viii li and Torrentius ad Horat Sermon l i sat 2 v 101 At a memorable supper thirty slaves waited round the table ten young men feasted with Theodora Her charity was universal

Et lassata virus necdum satiata recessit

27 Anonym de Antiquitat P l iii 132 in Banduri Imperium Orient tom i p 47 Ludewig (p 154) argues sensibly that Theodora would not have immortalised a brothel but I apply this fact to her second and chaster residence at Constantinople

50 This dialogue which Theophanes has preserved exhibits the popular language as well as the manners of Constantinople in the sixth century. Their Greek is mingled with many strange and barbarous words for which Ducange cannot always find a meaning or etymology.

51 See this church and monastery in Ducange C. P. Christiana l. iv p. 182.

52 The history of the Nika sedition is extracted from Marcellinus (in Chron. [an. 532]) Procopius (Persic l. i c. 26 [c. 24 tom. i p. 119 ed Bonn]) John Malala (tom. ii p. 213-218 [ed Ox. p. 473-477 ed Bonn]) Chron. Paschal (p. 336-340 tom. i p. 620 sqq. [ed Bonn]) Theophanes (Chronograph p. 154-158 [ed Par. tom. i p. 278-286 ed Bonn]) and Zonaras (l. xiv p. 61-63).

53 Marcellinus says in general terms innumera populi in circo trucidati. Procopius numbers 30,000 victims (tom. i p. 129 ed Bonn) and the 35,000 of Theophanes are swelled to 40,000 by the more recent Zonaras (tom. i p. 63). Such is the usual progress of exaggeration.

54 Hierocles a contemporary of Justinian composed his Συνημμ. (Itineraria p. 631) or review of the eastern provinces and cities before the year 535 (Wesseling in Præfat. and Not. ad p. 623 etc.).

55 See the Book of Genesis (xii. 10) and the administration of Joseph. The annals of the Greeks and Hebrews agree in the early arts and plenty of Egypt but this antiquity supposes a long series of improvement and Warburton who is almost stifled by the Hebrew calls aloud for the Samaritan chronology (Divine Legation vol. iii p. 29 etc.).

56 Eight millions of Roman modi besides a contribution of 80,000 aurei for the expenses of water-carriage from which the subject was graciously excused. See the thirteenth Edict of Justinian (c. viii.) the numbers are checked and verified by the agreement of the Greek and Latin texts.

57 Homer's Iliad is 289. These veils πίσσω μακροί were the work of the Sidonian women. But this passage is more honourable to the manufactures than to the navigation of Phœnicia from whence they had been imported to Troy in Phrygian bottoms.

58 See in Ovid (de Arte Amandi iii. 269 etc.) a poetical list of twelve colours borrowed from flowers the elements etc. But it is almost impossible to discriminate by words all the nice and various shades both of art and nature.

59 By the discovery of cochineal etc. we far surpass the colours of antiquity. Their royal purple had a strong smell and a dark cast as deep as bull's blood—obscuritas rubens (says Cassiodorus Va. l. i c. 2) negredo sanguinea. The President Goguet (Origine des Loix et des Arts part ii. l. ii c. 2 p. 184-215) will amuse and satisfy the reader.

I doubt whether his book especially in England is as well known as it deserves to be.

60 Historical proofs of this jealousy have been occasionally introduced and many more might have been added but the arbitrary acts of despotism were justified by the sober and general declarations of law (Codex Theodosian l. x tit. 21 leg. 3 Codex Justinian l. xi tit. 8 leg. 5). An inglorious permission and necessary restriction was applied to the mimes the female dancers (Cod. Theodos l. xv tit. 7 leg. 11).

61 In the history of insects (far more wonderful than Ovid's Metamorphoses) the silkworm holds a conspicuous place. The bombyx of the isle of Ceos as described by Pliny (Hist. Natur xi. 26-27 with the notes of the two learned Jesuits Hardouin and Brotier) may be illustrated by a similar species in China (Mémoires sur les Chinois tom. ii p. 575-598) but our silkworm as well as the white mulberry tree were unknown to Theophrastus and Pliny.

62 Georgic ii. 121. Serica quando venerint in usum planissime non scio suspicor tamen in Julio Cæsaris vero nam ante non invenio says Justus Lipsius (Excursus ad Treit. Annal ii. 32). See Dion Cassius (l. xlii. [c. 21] p. 358 edit Reimar) and Pausanias (l. vi. [c. 26 § 6-9] p. 519) the first who describes however strangely the Seric insect.

63 Tam longinquo orbe petitur ut in publico matrona transluceat ut denudet forminas vestis (Plin. vi. 20 xi. 26) Varro and Publius Syrus had already played on the Toga vitrea ventus textilis and nebula lineæ (Horat. Sermon i. 101 with the notes of Torrentius and Dacier).

64 On the texture colours names and use of the silk hall silk and linen garments of antiquity see the profound diffuse and obscure researches of the great Salmasius (in Hist. August p. 127-309 310 339 341 342 344 388-391 393 313) who was ignorant of the most common trades of Dyon or Leyden.

65 Flavius Vopiscus in Aurelian c. 45 in Hist. August p. 224. See Salmasius ad Hist. Aug. p. 392 and Plinian Exercitatus in Solinum p. 694 695. The Anecdotes of Procopius (c. 25) state a partial and imperfect rate of the price of silk in the time of Justinian.

66 Procopius de Edif. l. iii. c. 1. These πύρρας de mer are found near Smyrna Sicily Corsica and Minorca and a pair of gloves of their silk was presented to Pope Benedict XIV.

Of the Parthian or Persian empire Isidore of Charax (in Stathmus Parthicus p. 7 8 in Hudson Geograph. Minor tom. ii) has marked the roads and Ammianus Marcellinus (l. xxiii. c. 6 p. 400) has enumerated the provinces.

68 The blind admiration of the Jesuits confounds the different periods of the Chinese history. They are more critically distinguished by M. de Guignes (Hist des Huns, tom 1 part 1 in the Tables, part II. in the Geography Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom xxxii xxxvi du xliii), who discovers the gradual progress of the truth of the annals and the extent of the monarchy, till the Christian era. He has searched with a curious eye the connections of the Chinese with the nations of the West but these connections are slight, casual, and obscure, nor did the Romans entertain a suspicion that the Seres or Sinitæ possessed an empire not inferior to their own.

69 The roads from China to Persia and Hindostan may be investigated in the relations of Hackluyt and Thevenot (the ambassadors of Sharokh, Anthony Jenkinson, the Père Greuber, etc. See likewise Hanway's Travels, vol 1 p 345-357). A communication through Tibet has been lately explored by the English sovereigns of Bengal.

70 For the Chinese navigation to Malacca and Achin, perhaps to Ceylon, see Renaudot (on the two Mahometan Travellers, p 8-11, 13-17, 141-157), Dampier (vol 1 p 136), the Hist Philosophique des deux Indes (tom 1 p 98), and the Hist Générale des Voyages (tom vi p 201).

71 The knowledge, or rather ignorance, of Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, Arrian, Marcian, etc., of the countries eastward of Cape Comorin, is finely illustrated by D'Anville (Antiquité Géographique de l'Inde, especially p 161-198). Our geography of India is improved by commerce and conquest, and has been illustrated by the excellent maps and memoirs of Major Rennell. If he extends the sphere of his inquiries with the same critical knowledge and sagacity, he will succeed and may surpass the first of modern geographers.

72 The Topographie of Pliny (li 24), Solinus (c 56), and Salmastrius Pliniana Exercitatio (p 781, 782), and most of the ancients, who often confound the islands of Ceylon and Sumatra, is more clearly described by Cosmas Indicopleustes yet even the Christian topographer has exaggerated its dimensions. His information on the Indian and Chinese trade is rare and curious (li ii p 158 li xi p 337, 338, edit Montfaucon [Coll Nova Patrum, tom II Paris, 1766]).

73 See Procopius, Periplus (li i c 20 [li i c 10]). Cosmas affords some interesting knowledge of the port and invention of Adulis (Topographie Christ li p 170, 140-143), and of the trade of the Axumites along the African coast of Brbera or Zambri (p 136, 130), and as far as Laprobane (li xl p 730).

74 See the Christian missions in India in Cosmas (li i p 178 179 li xi p 337) and consult Assemani Biblioth Orient (tom ii p 419 443).

75 The invention, manufacture and general use of silk in China, may be seen in D'Anville (Descriptio Générale de la Chine tom ii p 130-131). The province of Szechuan is the most renowned for the quantity and quality.

76 Procopius Rel. Eccles li c 17. Periplus 200. Herbert apud Pineda (see below) p 27.

[ed Hoeschel, p 26 a, ed Bekk.] Zonaras, tom ii l xiv p 69) Pagi (tom ii p 602) assigns to the year 552 this memorable importation. Menander (in Excerpt Legum p 107 [p 295, 206, ed Bonn]) mentions the admiration of the Sogdianes, and Theophylact Simocatta (li vii c 9) darkly represents the two rival kingdoms in (China) the country of silk.

77 Cosmas, surnamed Indicopleustes, or the Indian navigator, performed his voyage about the year 522, and composed at Alexandria, between 535 and 547, Christian Topography (Montfaucon, Præfat c 1), in which he refutes the impious opinion that the earth is a globe, and Photius had read this work (Cod xxxvi p 9, 10 [p 7, ed Bekk]), which displays the prejudices of a monk, with the knowledge of a merchant: the most valuable part has been given in French and in Greek by Melchisedec Thevenot (Relations Curieuses, part 1), and the whole is since published in a splendid edition by Père Montfaucon (Collectio Nova Patrum, Paris, 1766, 2 vols in fol tom ii p 113-346). But the editor, a theologian, might blush at not discovering the Nestorian heresy of Cosmas, which has been detected by La Croze (Christianisme des Indes, tom 1 p 40-56).

78 Evagrius (li iii c 30 40) is minute and grateful, but angry with Zosimus for calumniating the great Constantine. In collecting all the bonds and records of the tax, the humanity of Ammianus was diligent and artful: fathers were sometimes compelled to prostitute their daughters (Zosim Hist li c 38, p 165, 166, Lipsius, 1784 [p 104 ed Bonn]). Timotheus of Gaza chose such an event for the subject of a tragedy (Suidas tom iii p 475), which contributed to the abolition of the tax (Codrenus, p 357 [ed Pir tom 1 p 627 ed Bonn])—an happy instance (if it be true) of the use of the theatre.

79 See Josephus Antiquities in the Bibliotheca Orientalis of Assemani (tom 1 p 263). The capitation tax is slightly mentioned in the Chronicle of Edessa.

80, Procopius (Anecdota c 10 [tom iii p 113 ed Bonn]) fixes this sum from the report of the treasurers then whelms. Libanius had mentioned it but far different was the empire from that of Anastasius.

81 Evagrius (li i c 90) in the next generation was moderate and well informed, and Zonaras (li xii c 61) in the twelfth century, had less wit, care, and thought without penetration, and the colours are almost as false as those of the Antiquities.

82 Procopius (Anecdota c 10 [tom iii p 113 ed Bonn]) in the next generation was moderate and well informed, and Zonaras (li xii c 61) in the twelfth century, had less wit, care, and thought without penetration, and the colours are almost as false as those of the Antiquities.

84 The Anecdotes (c 11-14 18 20-30) supply many facts and more complaints

85 One  $\kappa\alpha$  Scythopolis capital of the second Palestine and twelve for the rest of the province Aleman (p 59 [Procop tom iii p 407 408 ed Bonn]) honestly produces this fact from a MS Life of St Sabas by his disciple Cyril in the Vatican library and since published by Cotelierius

86 John Malala (tom ii p 232 [p 488 ed Bonn]) mentions the want of bread and Zonaras (l. xiv p 63) the leaden pipes which Justinian or his servants stole from the aqueducts

87 For an aureus one sixth of an ounce of gold instead of 210 he gave no more than 180 folles or ounces of copper A disproportion of the mint below the market price must have soon produced a scarcity of small money In England tudat pence in copper would sell for no more than sevens pence (Smith's Inquiry into the Wealth of Nations Bk i ch 4) For Justinian's gold coin see Evagrius (l. iv p 30)

88 The oath is conceived in the most formidable words (Novell viii tit 3) The defaulters imprecate on themselves quicquid habent telorum armamentaria coeli the part of Judas the leprosy of Giezi the tremor of Cain etc besides all temporal pains

89 A similar or more generous act of friendship is related by Lucian of Eudamidas of Corinth (in Tovare c 22 23 tom ii p 530) and the story has produced an ingenious though feeble comedy of Fontenelle

90 John Malala tom ii p 101 102 103 [p 171-173 ed Oxon 439 440 ed Bonn]

91 One of these Anatolius perished in an earthquake—doubtless a judgment! The complaints and clamours of the people in Agathias (l. v p 146 147 [ed Par p 284 29 ed Bonn]) are almost an echo of the anecdote The aliena pecunia reddenda of Corippus (l. ii 381 etc [Laud Just. Min]) is not very honourable to Justinian's memory

92 See the history and character of John of Cappadocia in Procopius (Persic l. i c 24 25 l. ii c 30 Vandal l. i p 13 Anecdote c 2 17 22) The agreement of the history and anecdotes is a mortal wound to the reputation of the prefect

94 The chronology of Procopius is loose and obscure but with the aid of Pagi I can discern that John was appointed Praetorian prefect of the East in the year 530 that he was removed in January 532—restored before June 533—banished in 541—an I recalled between June 548 and April 549 Aleman (p 96 97 [Procop tom iii p 449 450 ed Bonn]) gives the list of his ten successors—a rapid series in a part of a single reign

95 This conflagration is hinted by Lucian (in Hippia c 2) and Galen (l. iii de Temperamentis tom i p 81 edit Basil) in the second century A thousand years afterwards it is positively affirmed by Zonaras (l. ix p 424) on the faith of Dion Cassius by Tzetzes (Chiliad ii 119 etc) Eustathius (ad Iliad E p 338) and the scholiast of Lucian. See Fabricius (Biblioth Græc l. iii p 22 tom ii p 551 552 [ed Hamb 1716]) to whom I am more or less indebted for several of these quotations

96 Zonaras (l. xiv p 55) affirms the fact without quoting any evidence

97 Tzetzes describes the artifice of these burning glasses which he had read perhaps with no learned eyes in a mathematical treatise of Anthemius That treatise  $\tau\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \varpi\alpha\rho\ \delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\omega\ \mu\epsilon\chi\alpha\rho\eta\ \mu\acute{\alpha}\tau\eta\varsigma$  has been lately published translated and illustrated by M Dupuis a scholar and a mathematician (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions tom xlii p 392-451)

98 In the siege of Syracuse by the silence of Polybius Plutarch Lamy in the siege of Constantinople by that of Marcellinus and all the contemporaries of the sixth century

99 Without any previous knowledge of Tzetzes or Anthemius the immortal Buffon imagined and executed a set of burning glasses with which he could inflame planks at the distance of 200 feet (Supplément à l'Hist Naturelle tom i p 399 483 quarto edition) What miracles would not his genius have performed for the public service with royal expense and in the strong sun of Constantinople or Syracuse!

100 John Malala (tom ii p 120-124 [p 403-406 ed Bonn]) relates the fact but he seems to confound the names or persons of Proclus and Marinus

101 Agathias l. v p 149-152 [ed Par p 289-294 ed Bonn] The merit of Anthemius as an architect is loudly praised by Procopius (de Ædific l. i p 1 [tom iii p 174 ed Bonn]) and Paulus Silentarius (part i 134 etc [p 15 ed Bonn])

102 See Procopius (de Ædificiis l. i c 1 l. ii c 3) He relates a coincidence of dreams which supposes some fraud in Justinian or his architect They both saw in a vision the same plan for stopping an inundation at Dara A stone quarry near Jerusalem was revealed to the emperor (l. v c. 6 [tom. iii p 323 ed Bonn]) an angel was tricked into the perpetual custody of St Sophia (Anonym de Antiqu C P l. iv p 70)

HYPERTHYROIDISM (GRAVES' DISEASE), DIFFUSE AND NODULAR TOXIC GOITER MALIGNANT EXOPHTHALMOS

PARRY<sup>1</sup> and later Graves described a clinical syndrome characterized by exophthalmos, diffuse goiter and symptoms which we now know to be due to hyperthyroidism. On the Continent Basedow<sup>2</sup> independently described this same disorder. It has become apparent that the hypermetabolic symptoms resulting from overproduction of thyroid hormone may or may not be associated with the eye signs so characteristic of Graves' disease. Indeed it has often been noted that thyrotoxicosis is found in conjunction with a nodular goiter is usually not characterized by the presence of exophthalmos whereas protrusion of the eyes is a very frequent manifestation of diffuse toxic goiter. Furthermore, the eye signs noted in Graves' disease may be found in conjunction with the euthyroid or even the hypothyroid state.

As a result of the various combinations of symptoms and signs that may be encountered clinically, separate and distinct names have been given to the various forms of the disease. Explanation of these terms is therefore necessary. Hyperthyroidism and thyrotoxicosis are synonymous and refer to the metabolic manifestations due to excessive production of thyroid hormone. The term toxic goiter refers to thyrotoxicosis associated with enlargement of the thyroid gland of a diffuse or nodular character. Graves' disease in the sense originally described is a syndrome characterized by thyrotoxicosis, ophthalmopathy and diffuse thyroid enlargement. Common usage, however, has applied the term to all forms of thyrotoxicosis with or without eye signs and even to the pure ophthalmic syndrome. Toxic nodular goiter refers to thyrotoxicosis associated with a nodular goiter. Plummer<sup>3</sup> advanced the hypothesis that this type of goiter presented a different clinical picture than did diffuse toxic enlargement and that the manifestations of toxicity were due entirely to overactivity in the nodule. Most observers in the past, however, have felt that the hyperthyroidism was a manifestation of overactivity of the entire gland, the nodule representing a residuum of previous irregular hyperplasia and involution. Studies with radioactive iodine have revealed that some instances of toxic nodular goiter are actually due to overactivity of the nodule itself. In most instances, however, the hyperthyroidism is the result of increased activity of the entire gland, the nodular areas being relatively inactive.<sup>4, 171, 172</sup> The syndrome associated solely with eye signs has been variously referred to as hyperophthalmic Graves' disease, exophthalmic ophthalmoplegia,<sup>7</sup> and malignant exophthalmos.<sup>8</sup>

It is convenient for purposes of discussion to refer to all of these syndromes as manifestations of Graves disease. In the discussion that follows, however, the special considerations involved in each type of syndrome will be more fully developed.

Etiology—The etiology of Graves disease is unknown. It has been repeatedly noted, however, that psychic trauma may precede the onset of the disease.<sup>7-10, 37</sup> Conrad<sup>10</sup> has claimed that she has been able to elicit a history of emotional upset in 94 per cent of patients with hyperthyroidism. However, most observers, although not employing detailed psychiatric techniques, have been unable to obtain as high an incidence of preceding emotional stress. It is of interest that the incidence of Graves disease was extremely low in the armed forces in spite of the fact that careful search was made for evidences of this disorder. Nevertheless, at home, the onset of thyrotoxicosis was often preceded by the receipt of unfavorable news concerning relatives. The army personnel, of course, represents a highly selected population, carefully screened by physical and psychiatric tests. It is equally possible that the circumstances and type of stress encountered in military life may not be conducive to the production of this illness. Ham and his group<sup>34</sup> have suggested that Graves' disease tends to occur in individuals frustrated in early life but who make continued efforts towards a premature self-sufficiency and when these efforts fail develop chronic anxieties.

The question arises concerning the status of the adrenal cortex in thyrotoxicosis. There is evidence which would point to the presence of some impairment of adrenal cortical function in this disease. Clinically, patients with Graves disease may manifest asthenia and pigmentation resembling that observed in Addison's disease. In addition, the presence of a diffuse lymphadenopathy, lymphocytosis, and often an increase in circulating eosinophils, as well as a decrease in the urinary excretion of the neutral 17 ketosteroids, suggests impairment of adrenal cortical function. However, this is not invariable since the urinary excretion of the 11 oxygenated steroids is often normal and may even be increased and the chloride content of sweat is frequently reduced except in severe Graves disease.<sup>38</sup> It is possible that the presence or absence of impairment of adrenal cortical function may be related to the severity of the hyperthyroidism. LeCompte<sup>4</sup> has described a reduction in the width of the adrenal cortex in Graves disease.

Graves disease may occur at any age. The greatest frequency, however, is noted between the ages of twenty and forty years. The incidence of the disorder is far greater in females than in males. In regions where goiter is non-endemic, the female preponderance is in a ratio of 4 to 1.<sup>11</sup> In endemic areas, this ratio is much lower, being 4 to 3,<sup>12</sup> an incidence similar to that of nontoxic goiter in the same region,<sup>1</sup> suggesting a relationship between toxic and nontoxic goiter.<sup>12</sup> It was claimed by McClelland and Hathaway<sup>13</sup> that the geographic distribution in the United States of simple goiter and hyperthyroidism was similar. However, in Sweden, no such correlation was noted.<sup>15</sup> Finally, it is evident that there is no dearth of thyrotoxicosis in non-endemic areas. A familial incidence of the disorder has been noted by various observers.<sup>17, 108, 109</sup> There is some seasonal variation in the occurrence of thyrotoxicosis the greatest incidence generally occurring during the spring and falling off appreciably during the fall months <sup>4</sup>

Of great interest is the report of Iversen<sup>15</sup> on an epidemic wave of thyrotoxicosis in Denmark during World War II. Although Plummer<sup>19</sup> had previously reported an epidemic rise in the incidence of thyrotoxicosis in Olmsted County, Minnesota, in the years 1924 to 1927, it is possible that this represented simply an increase in frequency of hospitalization of the afflicted individuals. The Danish epidemic was apparently unrelated to the stress of German occupation since no such increase occurred in occupied Belgium, Holland or Norway. It was probably unrelated to diet and in due time the epidemic spontaneously subsided. A suitable etiologic explanation for the epidemic is still lacking.

The Pathology of Graves Disease—In diffuse goiter associated with Graves disease the thyroid is firm, enlarged, and hyperplastic. Grossly it may be red in color as a result of the marked vascularity. The cut surface of the gland appears meaty and no colloid is visible. The microscopic examination reveals the cells to be tall columnar. Cytologic evidences of the hyperplasia include hypertrophy of the Golgi apparatus<sup>9</sup> and an increased number of mitochondria.<sup>1</sup> The follicles contain scant amounts of a pale staining colloid. The follicular epithelium is elevated and folded in papillary like projections that encroach on the lumen of the acini. Distributed throughout the highly vascular interstitium there are large and small lymphoid follicles. If the gland is removed following the administration of iodine to the patient marked involutionary changes occur. The height of the follicular epithelium is reduced, the cells appear cuboidal and colloid is abundant and dark staining. The acini are larger and the solid islands of epithelium which are noted in the untreated gland are less abundant.

In the thyroid of the patient with toxic nodular goiter the hyperplasia and hypertrophy may be diffuse, or localized to the nodule or even to the extranodular tissue. Following iodine therapy involutionary changes are observed wherever hyperplasia had previously been present. Enlargement of the thymus, lymph nodes, and spleen are frequently observed.<sup>20</sup> This is part of the hyperplasia of lymphatic tissue so commonly encountered in hyperthyroidism. The pituitary gland may be enlarged and the percentage of chromophobe cells in the adenohypophysis is often increased while the percentage of eosinophils is decreased. The basophil cells according to Kraus<sup>21</sup> frequently show vacuolization. Means<sup>12</sup> however found no abnormalities in the hypophysis in 4 patients and Holst<sup>13</sup> was unable to find any significant changes in the group he studied. No constant changes have been noted in the parathyroid glands. Rarely the gonads may show some atrophic changes.<sup>22</sup> The findings in the adrenal cortex are of interest. Although in the experimental animal exogenous thyroid intoxication results in adrenal cortical hypertrophy, in the thyrotoxic patient the adrenal cortex is narrowed.<sup>14</sup> At postmortem examination the heart is enlarged and hypertrophied in approximately half the cases.<sup>23,24</sup> However studies by Friedberg and Sohval<sup>25</sup> would indicate that the cardiac hypertrophy observed in hyperthyroidism is generally associated with other etiologic factors, except in those instances in which auricular fibrillation is present. The histologic findings in the heart are inconstant and not particularly characteristic of hyperthyroidism. It is possible that the lymphocytic and histiocytic infiltration, as well as the myocardial necrosis and fibrosis so often observed represent the result of ancillary pathologic processes, such as coronary sclerosis rather than hyperthyroidism.<sup>2-21</sup>

In approximately 90 per cent of the patients with thyrotoxicosis the liver may show marked fatty changes with focal and sometimes central areas of necrosis.<sup>22-25</sup> These changes may be extensive enough to result in atrophy and occasionally in cirrhosis. The cirrhotic changes are characterized by dilatation of the portal canals with a periportal lymphocytic infiltration. A network of thin strands of connective tissue unite the affected canals and impart a fine nodularity to the liver. Beaver and Pemberton<sup>26</sup> have studied the liver at postmortem examination in 107 patients with thyrotoxicosis. They found that the hepatic lesions were predominantly of three types. The most common lesion was that of acute degenerative changes with fatty infiltration and focal and central necrosis. The next most common change observed was that of atrophy, which was present in two thirds of the patients. In these instances the average weight of the livers was 1316 grams. Subacute toxic atrophy and cirrhosis, which was the third type of alteration encountered, was present in over half the cases. It is important to emphasize that these observations were made in patients who died of hyperthyroidism and therefore probably represent extreme changes. More recent studies in which liver puncture biopsies were performed for the most part failed to reveal these changes.<sup>2, 21a</sup>

FIG. 90.—Thyroid of Graves disease undergoing involution under iodine treatment. The papillary processes are being withdrawn from the enlarged acini and the colloid is reappearing. Above and below there is still dense hyperplastic tissue.  $\times 150$  (Royd Textbook of Pathology.)

Although lymphocytic infiltration of the skeletal musculature has been reported these changes are by no means constant. Such lymphocytic infiltration may also be observed in the musculature of the eyelid.<sup>22-24</sup> Studies conducted in our laboratory<sup>40</sup> have demonstrated that exophthalmos in the guinea pig induced by the administration of thyrotropin is associated with a marked increase in the mucoprotein and water content of the retro-orbital tissue. A similar substance is found in the pretibial myxedema sometimes encountered in patients in association with post-operative severe exophthalmos.<sup>41 & 42</sup> 1-5 324-325

FIG. 98.—Recurrent Graves' disease with severe exophthalmos.

The Signs and Symptoms of Graves' Disease — The signs and symptoms observed in Graves' disease are mostly the result of the excessive production of thyroid hormone by the thyroid gland. Our present conception of the pathogenesis of diffuse toxic goiter envisages the excessive production of thyrotropin which stimulates the thyroid gland to hypertrophy and hyperplasia with the resultant elaboration of more thyroid hormone than is necessary for purely physiologic needs. In addition to the fundamental action of thyrotropin there is some evidence to indicate that the unrelated fractions exercises a direct effect on some tissues other than that of the thyroid gland.<sup>317</sup> Malignant exophthalmos and pretibial myxedema probably represent such effects while the other clinical manifestations of Graves' disease are due to the presence of excessive amounts of thyroid hormone. However Werner<sup>14</sup> holds the opinion that diffuse toxic goiter arises from mechanisms not mediated through the adenohypophysis. The clinical symptomatology associated with toxic adenoma in contrast to that observed in diffuse toxic goiter would suggest that all of the manifestations in the former group were due to the thyroid hormone alone.

In comparing the clinical manifestations of diffuse toxic goiter and toxic adenoma the symptoms and the goiter appear concomitantly in the former usually prior to the age of thirty-five. The thyroid is diffusely enlarged and the eye signs and the nervous and emotional symptoms are marked. Tachycardia is common but auricular fibrillation is infrequent. In toxic nodular goiter on the other hand there is usually a history of goiter antedating the onset of the symptoms. The patients are usually past the age of forty. The eye signs and emotional manifestations are minimal but auricular fibrillation and heart disease are common. The frequency with which recurrence occurs following surgery is much less in the latter group than in the former. However inasmuch as many of the manifestations in both diffuse and toxic nodular goiter are similar we shall discuss the manifestations of both types of syndrome together pointing out where necessary the details in which they differ.

Although the thyrotoxic patient may be of any age the group most frequently affected is between twenty and forty years of age. The disease is much more common in females, being 4 times as frequent as in males. There is no characteristic bodily habitus. We have observed both obese and emaciated patients with thyrotoxicosis. For the most part their nutritional status appears to be adequate probably because the ravenous appetite so often present in this disorder is prevented more than a moderate weight loss. The typical facies is characterized by prominent or bulging eyes and an anxious unblinking expression. The hands tremble, the skin is warm and moist and the patients tend to speak volubly and rapidly. They fidget constantly and are rarely at rest. This clinical picture is that of a patient with diffuse toxic goiter.

In toxic nodular goiter the clinical manifestations may be similar except for the absence of the striking eye signs. In this group the eyes may be bright and glittering but exophthalmos is uncommon. The so-called apathetic Graves disease in which the symptoms of hyperthyroidism are subdued is much more frequently encountered in toxic nodular goiter than in toxic diffuse goiter.

In thyrotoxicosis the hair and skin are thin and of a smooth, silky texture.<sup>45</sup> The skin is warm and moist, and sweating is increased. These patients usually manifest intolerance to heat and prefer cold to hot weather. An erythema is commonly noted over the pressure areas particularly over the elbows, knuckles and thenar and hypothenar eminences of the palms. Dermatographia can generally be readily elicited. Although in 50 per cent of the patients increased pigmentation of the skin is noted the mucous membranes remain free.<sup>46</sup> Vitiligo occurs in approximately 10 per cent. Alopecia of the scalp may occur during the course of the illness and Williams<sup>4</sup> has pointed out that the axillary hairs markedly decreased. Premature graying of the hair may be encountered. The nails may exhibit longitudinal or transverse grooves. In the male gynecomastia is occasionally seen. This may be due to the associated liver damage with impaired estrogen detoxification.

Goiter is usually present, although in times of function it thyroid hyperactivity without anatomical enlargement do occur. It should be emphasized that the gland may be intrathoracic and hence may not present at its usual location. In such instances it could be detected by roentgen examination, or probe tubes with radioactive iodine.<sup>34</sup> In diffuse enlargement of the thyroid the gland runs smooth and becomes firm to the touch. The increase in size is usually symmetrical but one lobe may be larger than the other. In toxic nodular goiter the gland is irregularly enlarged. In toxic goiter, the gland becomes markedly vascular and a thrill may be palpable or a bruit audible. Such findings are of great confirmatory value in establishing the diagnosis. However they are not always present nor necessarily pathognomonic since a bruit is occasionally heard over a nontoxic goiter. A thrill however is rarely felt in the absence of thyrotoxicosis.<sup>35</sup> Lamin<sup>36</sup> found a bruit to be present in 77 per cent and a thrill in 85 per cent of patients with thyrotoxicosis. Pressure symptoms may result from enlargement of the thyroid although this occurs more commonly in association with the nodular variety. Such symptoms however are much less frequent in toxic than in nontoxic goiter. Evidences of pressure are cough, some difficulty in breathing and swelling and compression of the trachea and occasionally of the esophagus. Hoarseness is unusual although a recurrent nerve type of paralysis of the vocal cord occasionally occurs. This manifestation is far more common in malignancy and inflammatory disease of the thyroid than in thyrotoxicosis.

The presence of a goiter is so frequent in hyperthyroidism that if none is readily apparent one should search for an aberrant location of the gland. Not only may the gland reside anywhere along its embryologic course from the base of the tongue to its adult location in front of the trachea but it may be found in a retrosternal or intrathoracic position.

The Circulation in Hyperthyroidism - The augmented metabolic requirements of the patient with thyrotoxicosis increase the burden on the circulation. In an effort to compensate for the increment in the metabolic needs of the tissues both the cardiac output and the circulatory rate are markedly increased. The increase in the cardiac output is effected chiefly by an acceleration in the heart rate and minimally, if at all, by an increase in stroke volume.<sup>37,38</sup> It is for this reason that patients with hyperthyroidism have a marked tachycardia which is present while the patient is awake and asleep.<sup>39</sup> The systolic and mean pressure in the right ventricle and pulmonary artery are increased while the diastolic pressure remains undisturbed. Associated with these changes there is an increase in the pulmonary blood flow although no change occurs in the pulmonary vascular resistance. Despite the increase in cardiac output there is no change in the hepatic blood flow.<sup>40</sup> Since the oxygen requirement of the body may be increased as much as 50 to 100 per cent the cardiac output may be doubled. It may however be augmented even more than the increase in oxygen requirement would suggest for the arteriovenous difference is almost always reduced in thyrotoxicosis.<sup>41</sup> The circulation time is markedly accelerated and in the absence of heart failure is generally less than ten seconds when measured from arm to tongue.<sup>42,43</sup> Although Blumgart and his coworkers<sup>44</sup> have reported a direct correlation between the circulatory rate and the based metabolic rate this is not consistently observed. The circulating blood volume is increased by approximately 10 per cent.<sup>44</sup> In Graves disease, the blood flow through the skin is increased. In normal subjects only 3 per cent of the cardiac output is routed through the skin, while in hyperthyroidism 6 per cent of the output flows through the cutaneous vessels. Direct observation of these vessels by means of capillary microscopy reveals the marked dilatation<sup>45</sup> which is probably at least in part the result of increased tissue metabolism. The venous return is increased and contributes to the augmented cardiac output. The work of the heart is performed much less efficiently in a patient with thyrotoxicosis than in the normal subject.<sup>46, 47</sup> Exercise or any factors which increase the cardiac load are carried out only at the cost of excessive increases in cardiac output and oxygen consumption. It is for this reason that heart failure is more likely to occur in the thyrotoxic patient when hypertension or coronary artery disease further lessen the efficiency of the heart.

The subjective symptoms of which the patients with hyperthyroidism frequently complain are palpitation, exertional dyspnea and precordial pain. Palpitation may accompany the tachycardia or may represent premature contractions or paroxysmal episodes of auricular fibrillation or rarely auricular flutter. It is possible that the sensation experienced may reflect the hyperactivity of the auricular muscle. A throbbing sensation in the neck due to the marked pulsation of the neck vessels is a frequent complaint. Since the ordinary oxygen needs of the resting thyrotoxic patient are increased and the vital capacity is decreased,<sup>48</sup> minimal or moderate exertion will be reflected in dyspnea which is not necessarily the result of heart failure. This is particularly true in places of high altitude where dyspnea is one of the most common complaints noted in thyrotoxicosis. The precordial pain which is sometimes encountered is usually mild and of a dull and aching character. This symptom was complained of in 16 per cent of the group of patients reported by Lerman and Means.<sup>49</sup> At times true angina pectoris may occur. This may be due to episodes of paroxysmal arrhythmia or it may be the result of the increased strain of the thyrotoxicosis on a heart with coronary arterio-sclerosis. Both types of angina may be alleviated by the treatment of the thyrotoxicosis.

On examination the cardiac apical impulse is easily detected because of its forcefulness. Clinically in uncomplicated thyrotoxicosis the heart is usually not enlarged but the sounds are loud and thumping in character. The first apical sound is often accentuated and may be confused with that heard in mitral stenosis. Both basal sounds are increased in intensity and a systolic murmur may be audible over the whole precordium. In addition there is dilatation of the pulmonary artery which can be demonstrated by a teleroentgenogram of the heart. The systolic blood pressure is usually increased and the diastolic pressure is slightly decreased with a resultant high pulse pressure. The carotid vessels pulsate forcibly and reflect this increase in the pulse pressure.

On fluoroscopic and roentgenologic examination the heart is usually found to be normal in size. The pulsations of the left ventricle are forceful the pulmonary artery segment is prominent but no enlargement of any of the cardiac chambers is demonstrable. The presence of cardiac enlargement usually suggests the coexistence of some other form of heart disease although it may occur in the presence of continuous auricular fibrillation or heart failure. The electrocardiogram in hyperthyroidism is usually characterized by prominent P waves in all leads.<sup>4</sup> The T waves may be high but this is an inconsistent feature.

Paroxysmal auricular fibrillation was encountered in 10 per cent of a series of 7000 patients with hyperthyroidism and continuous auricular fibrillation occurred in 6 per cent.<sup>5,6</sup> The latter is generally although not always preceded by paroxysmal episodes. Auricular fibrillation occurs much more commonly in toxic nodular goiter than in diffuse goiter. It is relatively uncommon before the age of forty-five years and is rare under the age of thirty; it occurs with a somewhat greater frequency in males. Episodes of paroxysmal auricular fibrillation particularly in the younger age group should raise the suspicion of the presence of hyperthyroidism. In the older age group the incidence of auricular fibrillation increases in proportion to the duration of the thyrotoxicosis.<sup>5,6</sup> Neither paroxysmal nor continuous auricular fibrillation respond satisfactorily to treatment with either quinidine or digitalis unless the underlying hyperthyroidism is brought under control. Following the successful treatment of the thyrotoxicosis the episodes of paroxysmal auricular fibrillation will generally eventually cease although such episodes occurring at infrequent intervals may continue for years. One-third of the patients with continuous auricular fibrillation will be spontaneously restored to normal rhythm following the successful treatment of the hyperthyroidism and in a considerable percentage of the remainder normal sinus rhythm will be established with the aid of quinidine.

The development of congestive heart failure is rare in uncomplicated thyrotoxicosis and particularly uncommon in patients under the age of forty. When other forms of heart disease complicate hyperthyroidism heart failure has been reported to occur in 25 per cent of the patients.<sup>7</sup> This is in contrast to an over-all incidence of only 4.1 per cent in a series of 1000 patients which included various age groups and both complicated and uncomplicated thyrotoxicosis.<sup>8</sup> The incidence of congestive failure markedly increases after the onset of auricular fibrillation. One-half of this latter group manifests congestive failure in incidence which is four times as great as that observed in patients with normal rhythm.<sup>8</sup> Similarly half the patients with heart failure and thyrotoxicosis have auricular fibrillation.<sup>8</sup> Lacey and Hurxthal<sup>9</sup> found that with the correction of the hyperthyroid state cardiac compensation could be permanently restored in 95 per cent of their patients. The usual therapeutic measures employed for heart failure are relatively ineffective until the thyrotoxicosis is controlled. It is perhaps important to emphasize that the clinical picture of hyperthyroidism may be overshadowed by intractable congestive failure. Such masked hyperthyroidism should be suspected where heart failure or irregularities of cardiac rhythm which are usually amenable to proper therapy fail to respond. Yohalem Barton and Silver<sup>10</sup> studied the urinary excretion of radioactive iodine and the serum protein bound iodine in 53 patients with continuous auricular fibrillation in whom overt clinical evidence of thyrotoxicosis was lacking. In 8 patients of this group the twenty four hour urinary excretion of  $I_{131}$  was less than 20 per cent, and in another 5 patients was between 20 and 30 per cent. In 8 of these 13 patients, the serum protein bound iodine was above 6 micrograms per cent. It would seem then that 15 per cent of this group of 35 patients with aortic atherosclerosis had masked hyperthyroidism.

Hepatic Manifestations—Jaundice is rarely encountered in hyperthyroidism. Since this complication appears in the severe thyrotoxic state its rarity today may be due to the early institution of treatment. At the Yale Clinic jaundice was encountered in 0.5 per cent of patients with hyperthyroidism<sup>68</sup> while in our hospital it occurred in 2 of 26 fatal cases of thyrotoxicosis.<sup>69</sup> However, evidence of impaired hepatic function has been reported in 90 per cent of patients with Graves' disease when a battery of liver function tests are employed.<sup>69</sup> This however is by no means a constant finding<sup>70</sup> and perhaps depends on the duration and severity of the thyrotoxicosis. Vitamin deficiency, so often present in hyperthyroidism may contribute to the functional impairment of the liver.

Gastrointestinal Symptoms—The appetite is usually excessively increased although anorexia has been noted in some patients. Despite the increase in appetite and food intake weight loss is almost always present. Nausea and vomiting are uncommon but looseness of the bowels and even diarrhea is frequent. Achlorhydria is present in one third of the patients but free hydrochloric acid may return with the successful treatment of the hyperthyroidism.<sup>68, 69</sup>

The Blood in Hyperthyroidism—The red blood cell count and hemoglobin are usually at normal levels. The total white blood cell count is often somewhat reduced and the differential study reveals a relative lymphocytosis.<sup>61</sup> An absolute increase in the monocytes has been reported.<sup>6</sup> A reduction in the neutrophilic leukocytes usually occurs but the eosinophils may be increased to 3 to 6 per cent. Lymphadenopathy is frequent in hyperthyroidism and although the spleen is usually enlarged it is not often palpable.

Gonitourinary Manifestations - Mild menstrual disturbances are often noted in hyperthyroidism and oligomenorrhea or even amenorrhea may be present. Menorrhagia is less frequently observed. Sterility is somewhat increased in both males and females with hyperthyroidism.

Renal function is unimpaired and despite the increase in the urinary excretion of calcium renal calculi are only rarely encountered.<sup>10</sup>

The Skeletal System in Hyperthyroidism - Hyperthyroidism is frequently associated with decalcification and osteoporosis. As a consequence of the bony alterations collapse of one or more vertebra may occur. Thyroidectomy or the medical correction of the thyrotoxicosis will result in amelioration of the bone pain but usually there is little or no ray evidence of recalcification. The ray picture encountered in hyperthyroidism is that of bony atrophy. The cortex becomes thin and there may be multiple small eroded areas of the trabeculae<sup>12</sup> but there are no cysts or giant cell tumors and no dilated Haversian canals are seen. The serum calcium phosphorus and alkaline phosphatase levels are usually normal but occasionally the serum calcium level may be elevated<sup>12,7</sup>. However anatomically cases have been reported in which in addition to evidences of osteoporosis extensive osteitis fibrosa is found<sup>128</sup> Albright and Reifenstein<sup>129</sup> believe that most of the skeletal manifestations may represent the secondary effects of nitrogen wastage and in these patients in the menopause are the effects of senile osteoporosis.

Neuropsychiatric and Muscular Manifestations in Hyperthyroidism — The thyrotoxic individual is markedly hyperkinetic. It has been suggested by Waldenström<sup>130</sup> that the depletion of the body stores of iodine produces many of the neurologic phenomena of hyperthyroidism including paraparesis, acalculia, psychosis with hallucinations, bulbar palsy, coma, myoencephalopathy, and chorea or choreoathetotic movements. These occur especially he says in thyroid crisis and are markedly ameliorated by the administration of iodine. Psychoses may be precipitated by the onset of thyrotoxicosis. It is particularly important that these patients be treated promptly since cure or amelioration of the psychotic state often follows the successful treatment of the thyrotoxicosis. It seems likely that hyperthyroidism per se does not produce a psychosis but allows a dormant psychotic state to become manifest. Indeed no special type of psychosis was noted in a large series of patients with hyperthyroidism studied by Dunbar and Moersch.<sup>131</sup> The most commonly encountered types were toxic exhaustion occurring chiefly in the young patients with exophthalmic goiter acute delirium noted frequently in the older individuals with nodular-toxic goiter and manic depressive states. Rowson and Schwab<sup>132</sup> have reported acceleration of cortical rhythm in the electroencephalographic tracing in hyperthyroidism while Condon and his coworkers<sup>133</sup> noted patterns resembling those seen in epilepsy although no convulsive seizures occurred. With adequate treatment for the hyperthyroidism the electroencephalographic pattern altered toward normal.

Muscle disorders are frequently associated with hyperthyroidism.<sup>134</sup> In acute thyrotoxic myopathy there may occur a rapidly developing bulbar palsy and a generalized weakness often ending in early death. Thyroidectomy or alleviation of the hyperthyroidism is often followed by recovery.<sup>135, 136</sup> It has been suggested that the myopathies like some of the neurologic manifestations result from depletion of the body iodine stores and may be improved by the administration of iodine.<sup>137</sup> Thyrotoxic periodic paralysis has been reported with cure following thyroidectomy.<sup>138</sup> In chronic thyrotoxic myopathy<sup>139, 140</sup> there is noted symmetrical wasting of the limbs and extremities especially of the proximal portions. Coarse muscular fibrillations are observed and the tendon reflexes are diminished. Creatinuria is usually found. Lymphocytic infiltrations of the muscles similar to that seen in myasthenia-gravis have been reported although prostigmine is of no value in treatment. Complete recovery is to be expected after cure of the hyperthyroidism.<sup>141</sup> When myasthenia gravis is present in association with thyrotoxicosis the former is aided by prostigmine but not by thyroidectomy.<sup>142, 143</sup> Myotonia, on the other hand has been reported in myxedema. Following treatment of the hypothyroidism the signs of the myotonia disappear.<sup>144, 145</sup> The most important muscular disorder encountered in hyperthyroidism however is that of exophthalmic ophthalmoplegia.<sup>146</sup>

The Eye—The eye signs may be classified as 1 the lid signs 2 the external changes in the lids or eyes 3 the extraocular palsies and ptoses, and 4 exophthalmos. The lid signs may occur in either diffuse or nodular toxic goiter, as well as in simple nontoxic adenoma and occasionally in individuals free from thyroid disease. The external changes which are less common in occurrence than the lid signs are observed more frequently in diffuse toxic goiter but are also seen in toxic adenoma. The rare extraocular palsies and ptoses are found almost exclusively in diffuse toxic goiter. This is equally true of exophthalmos.<sup>72 75 6 33-56</sup> The lid signs are several in number. Widening of the palpebral fissure on fixation (Dalrymple's sign) is due to lid retraction. It is noted in 9 per cent of patients with toxic adenoma and in 18 per cent of patients with diffuse goiter.<sup>52</sup> Lid lag (Von Graefe's sign) is much more frequent occurring in 4 out of 5 patients with diffuse toxic goiter in 2 out of 3 with toxic nodular goiter and in 1 out of 3 patients with simple nontoxic goiter.<sup>53</sup> Infrequent blinking (Stellwag) absence of gaze (Jeffers) difficulty in eversion of the lid (Gifford) and tremor of the closed lid (Rosenbach) are other lid signs observed less frequently. The exact mechanism for the production of these signs is unknown. Among the possibilities suggested are those of central nervous system changes similar to those encountered in encephalitis and instability of the autonomic innervation of the eye. In any event any explanation must account for the relaxation of the orbicularis oculi the contraction of the levator palpebre, and the tonic contraction of the involuntary smooth muscles of the lids.

The external ocular changes include weakness of convergence (Moebius) pigmentation of the skin of the lids (Jellinek) dilatation of the pupil following the instillation of adrenalin into the conjunctival sac (Loewi) and excessive lacrimation. The genesis of these signs is similarly obscure. The extraocular palsies are rare occurring in approximately one third of 1 per cent of patients with diffuse toxic goiter.<sup>70 76</sup> They may be divided into two groups. The first group consists of single or multiple extraocular palsies associated with exophthalmos and severe thyrotoxicosis. Complete bilateral or unilateral ophthalmoplegia with or without ptosis may occur. Following correction of the hyperthyroidism the exophthalmos and palsies usually improve. In this group there is a tendency for the muscles of elevation to be impaired first but any muscle may be involved and different muscles in each eye may become paretic. The other group of ocular palsies and exophthalmos occurs in association with mild hyperthyroidism and even occasionally without hyperthyroidism. The eye manifestations in this group either stay unimproved or as is more generally the case become worse after treatment of the hyperthyroidism. This type of disorder has been variously referred to as exophthalmic ophthalmoplegia<sup>7</sup> malignant exophthalmos<sup>54</sup> progressive exophthalmos following thyroidectomy<sup>55</sup> and rare disease with dissociation of thyrotoxicosis and ophthalmopathy<sup>51</sup>.

The genesis of the muscle palsies of the first group has not definitely been determined. It has been suggested that they may result from stretching of the extraocular muscles. However often a considerable degree of exophthalmos may be present without weakness of any of the muscles. Organic changes in the muscles consisting of lymphocytic infiltration and myo-fibrosis have been described, but these alterations appear to be rare in this group. Mulvaney's explanation<sup>34</sup> that the fibers undergo wasting with loss of striation, granulation of the sarcoplasm, and reduplication of the sarcolemmal nuclei does not appear to be tenable. The suggestion that this type of disorder is a manifestation of myasthenia gravis is also not acceptable since prostigmine is without effect on the involved muscles.

The syndrome of malignant exophthalmos is an extremely serious one. In contrast to the incidence of ordinary exophthalmic goiter it is more common in men than in women and is usually noted in middle life. As has been previously mentioned the metabolic manifestations in association with the eye signs may be minimal or absent. Indeed, the eye symptoms are usually markedly aggravated following subtotal thyroidectomy and, to a lesser extent perhaps with the use of the non surgical measures for the treatment of the thyrotoxicosis. The exophthalmos may become so marked that closure of the lids is impossible. The cornea being uncovered and unprotected becomes dry and opaque, and secondary ulceration may occur. In extreme cases the eyes may be lost and even after enucleation the orbital contents may continue to swell and enlarge. The recognition of this disorder is therefore important. Although the presence of the syndrome may become obvious after thyroidectomy has been performed, it is essential that the diagnosis be established prior to that stage. The important points are emphasized by Woods<sup>3</sup> as follows: In the early stages the degree of protrusion may be slight but it usually progresses until it becomes extreme. It may be unequal on the two sides. Whether the exophthalmos is slight or extreme it is usually accompanied by chemosis swelling of the lids reduction in motility of the eye and disturbances in muscle coordination symptoms of epiphora hyperemia and edema of the conjunctivae photophobia a sensation of hard resistance when the effort is made to reduce the exophthalmos by pressure on the globes. The extraocular paralyses and disturbances of muscle coordination have certain peculiarities especially emphasized by Brain.<sup>2</sup> These are the frequent involvement of muscle groups moving the eyes in one plane especially elevation. Only rarely is the ophthalmoplegia total usually isolated muscles or combinations of the recti and obliques being affected. The usual thyrotoxic lid signs are absent edema being the main symptom. Impairment of vision from optic neuritis is relatively common. The pupillary reactions are normal. Ptosis is more common than retraction of the lids. Frequently marked proliferation beyond the lid margin is observed. According to Means and his associates<sup>74, 67</sup> this syndrome is characterized by only a slight enlargement of the thyroid, meager evidence of hyperthyroidism marked ocular symptoms particularly that of orbital edema and a rapid subsidence of the metabolic signs and symptoms following the administration of iodine. The eye muscles on pathologic examination exhibit a hypertrophic myositis with interstitial fibrosis, edema and lymphocytic infiltration.<sup>75, 76</sup> It is probable that the palsies result from the stretching and fibrosis of the muscles. It is important to bear in mind that the exophthalmos may occasionally be unilateral. In those instances the differentiation from a retro-orbital tumor must be considered. Rays of the orbit in the latter instance will show destruction of the bone or foramina, whereas in malignant exophthalmos no bony alteration occurs.

The pathogenesis of exophthalmos is still a matter of dispute although it has been vigorously pursued by many investigators.<sup>75, 6, 21, 103, 340</sup> It is apparently not due to the thyroid hormone itself since the disorder is frequently noted in the presence of the euthyroid state and may be aggravated concomitantly with the development of the hypothyroid state. Moreover, it is occasionally helped by the administration of thyroid extract. A more commonly accepted explanation is the one which envisages the syndrome as resulting from an overproduction of an adenohypophyseal hormone possibly thyrotropin or more likely an as yet unidentified pituitary fraction found in association with the thyrotropin.<sup>217</sup> The administration of crude thyrotropin to the guinea pig will produce a transient exophthalmos which is more marked in the thyroidectomized animal.<sup>88, 100</sup>

Exophthalmos in general is present in over half of all patients with diffuse toxic goiter.<sup>75, 6</sup> The degree may be roughly measured by an exophthalmometer. In normal subjects the degree of protrusion of the eye when measured by this instrument may be as much as 16 mm, but in individuals with myopia may be greater. In diffuse toxic goiter the exophthalmometric readings usually vary between 16 and 24 mm. When exophthalmos is greater than 24 mm exposure of the cornea and its sequelae may follow. Severe exophthalmos may rarely result in papilledema and optic atrophy. Although it has long been thought that the nonmalignant forms of exophthalmos recede following treatment of the hyperthyroidism, recent studies would indicate that this is rather infrequent and more often a slight increase probably occurs.<sup>96, 97</sup> The apparent clinical improvement in the degree of exophthalmos is probably due to disappearance of the stare.

It is quite generally accepted that in clinical and experimental exophthalmos one or all of the following changes may be encountered: hypertrophy of the orbital contents; a hypertrophic myositis; relaxation of the striated extraocular muscles; edema of the orbital contents; dilatation of the orbital blood vessels; and contraction of the smooth muscles of the orbit or lids. It seems unlikely that contraction of the smooth muscles of the orbit plays much of a role in human exophthalmos inasmuch as these muscles are only vestigial remnants. It is equally unlikely that either dilatation of the vessels or relaxation of the striated musculature is important. Although hypertrophy of the orbital contents could theoretically produce exophthalmos it is more likely that edema plays a more significant part. Smelser<sup>100</sup> was able to produce exophthalmos in the guinea pig by the use of thyrotropin. The changes were more marked in the thyroidectomized animal and were less following the administration of thyroxine. The experimental exophthalmos was not prevented by extirpation of the cervical sympathetic nor of Mueller's muscle. The orbital contents with the exception of the lacrimal gland participated in the increase in weight. These structures included the fatty connective tissue, the extraocular muscles and the dorsal lacrimal gland. Histologically, the edema was marked and permeated the connective tissue. The changes were quite similar to those noted in clinical exophthalmos. These findings were subsequently confirmed by Paulson<sup>99</sup> and Aird.<sup>91</sup> Rundik and Pochm<sup>340</sup> working with human material reported that the water content of the fat free tissue was normal but that the fat content of the orbit was markedly increased. On the other hand Pochin<sup>306</sup> found results similar to those of Sinclair following the injection of pituitary extracts in the guinea pig. This problem was further investigated in our laboratory.<sup>40</sup> We found an increase in the hexo amine and water content of the orbital tissues in the exophthalmos of guinea pigs treated with thyrotropin. This would suggest that the edema of the orbital tissues was probably due to the hydrophobic action of the increased mucoprotein content.

A possible explanation for the relatively high incidence of malignant exophthalmos in men may be found in the report of Marine.<sup>10</sup> He observed that in the rabbit exophthalmos secondary to thyrotropin administration may be checked by castration and accelerated by testosterone.<sup>10</sup> This might also explain the beneficial effects occasionally noted following the use of stilbestrol. Dobyns<sup>307</sup> however failed to confirm these observations.<sup>37</sup>

The effects of the treatment of the hyperthyroidism on the exophthalmos encountered in Graves' disease has been reported by several observers. Careful serial measurements would seem to controvert the casual and commonly accepted impression that the exophthalmos of most patients with hyperthyroidism improves following subtotal thyroidectomy. The disappearance of lid retraction and associated eye signs convey this impression of improvement but when careful exophthalmometric readings are employed 70 to 97 per cent of the patients exhibit an increase in protrusion of the eyeballs.<sup>174, 307</sup> Following x ray treatment of the thyrotoxicosis however, Soley<sup>216</sup> found a further progression of the exophthalmos in only 20 per cent. Dobyns<sup>307</sup> found that of 11 patients treated with thiouracil 7 showed an increase in exophthalmos of over 1 mm.<sup>181, 307</sup> Beierwiler<sup>308</sup> separated his patients with thyrotoxicosis into two groups: those with malignant exophthalmos and those with the nonmalignant variety. Both groups were treated with thiouracil. Of the latter group only 10 per cent showed progression of the exophthalmos while all 7 patients with malignant exophthalmos showed progression. With the use of radioactive iodine Soley and his associates<sup>11</sup> found an increase in exophthalmos of 1.7 mm. or more in 30 per cent of 50 patients as compared to 26 per cent following x ray therapy and 50 to 60 per cent following subtotal thyroidectomy. The incidence of malignant exophthalmos is fortunately so uncommon that a large statistical series concerned with the effects of various forms of therapy has not as yet been accumulated. However the evidence would tend to indicate that malignant exophthalmos probably progresses following any definitive therapy directed at the thyrotoxicosis. Whether the progression is less with the use of radioactive iodine or x ray therapy as compared to subtotal thyroidectomy or treatment with the goitrogens is not certain. Most observers feel however that the prognosis is least favorable following subtotal thyroidectomy. In the nonmalignant variety the use of comparatively slow acting therapeutic agents such as x ray therapy, radioactive iodine and the goitrogens seems to be associated with less risk of inducing further exophthalmos than does the use of surgery. The treatment of malignant exophthalmos is dependent on the stage at which the diagnosis is established. Subtotal thyroidectomy should be avoided and medical measures should be employed to treat the thyrotoxicosis. The administration of thyroid hormone stilbestrol and even more rarely iodine may sometimes arrest or improve the disorder.<sup>12, 13, 14</sup> The rationale for these modes of therapy is based on their supposed ability to inhibit the secretion of thyrotropin and on the part of iodine to inactivate it.<sup>15</sup> Studies with the use of cortisone and ACTH suggest that these agents may be beneficial in some instances of exophthalmos.<sup>11, 16</sup> A ray directed at the hypophysis has been employed with variable success,<sup>10, 17</sup> but is worth trying. If the eye signs are progressive various surgical procedures may be necessary to save the eye. These include wedge excision of the conjunctiva, lateral tarsorrhaphy and orbital decompression.<sup>9</sup>

The Relationship of Diabetes Mellitus to Thyrotoxicosis—The intestinal absorption of carbohydrates including glucose and galactose is accelerated by the thyroid hormone.<sup>18</sup> The fasting blood sugar in hyperthyroidism is usually normal although in some instances it may be slightly increased.<sup>11</sup> Following the oral administration of glucose the blood sugar level at the end of one half hour is higher and subsequently falls more slowly than is observed in normal individuals. At the end of two hours however the blood sugar generally returns to a normal level.<sup>18</sup> These abnormalities frequently disappear following thyroidectomy.<sup>14</sup> Mild spontaneous glycosuria may be found in 40 per cent of the patients with diffuse toxic goiter and in 25 per cent of the patients with toxic adenoma.<sup>18</sup> The high postprandial blood sugar level is probably related to the rapid intestinal absorption as well as to the depletion of liver glycogen. This latter results in a form of mild starvation diabetes which is unrelated to ordinary diabetes mellitus since the thyroid has no direct effect on intermediary carbohydrate metabolism. Glucose is burned normally in patients with thyrotoxicosis and indeed, following the ingestion of glucose<sup>11</sup> the respiratory quotient frequently rises more than in normal individuals. It has been demonstrated experimentally that the administration of thyroid extract facilitates the induction of alloxan and pituitary diabetes as well as the diabetes of the partially depancreatized animal.<sup>19</sup> Thyroidectomy inhibits the development of experimental diabetes.<sup>19</sup> In the experimental animal diabetes increased by the administration of thyroid extract is characterized by a greater polyuria, a more severe loss of weight and a greater insulin requirement than in the comparable non thyroid treated diabetic animal. From a consideration of these factors it is therefore not astonishing that diabetes mellitus is exacerbated by the development of hyperthyroidism. Although hyperthyroidism is no more frequent in the diabetic than in the non-diabetic, diabetes is twice or even three times as common in patients with hyperthyroidism as in the euthyroid group. The incidence of diabetes mellitus is greater in patients with toxic adenoma than in those with diffuse toxic goiter. This probably is related to the older age of the former group.<sup>16</sup> When the two diseases are associated hyperthyroidism precedes the diabetes in 75 per cent of the patients.<sup>10</sup>

Since the fasting and postprandial blood sugar levels are frequently elevated in the patient with thyrotoxicosis the criteria ordinarily employed for the diagnosis of diabetes mellitus must be altered. The diagnosis of diabetes complicating hyperthyroidism should not be made when the

(a) blood sugar level is below 100 mgm per cent or the maximum following the oral administration of glucose is less than 200 mgm per cent. In thyrotoxicosis the insulin requirement for the control of the diabetes is increased and hypoglycemia when it occurs due to insulin overdosage, is usually more severe because of the depletion of liver glycogen. The successful treatment of the hyperthyroidism results in amelioration of the diabetes. The prognosis of the patient with diabetes mellitus with cured hyperthyroidism is no different from that of the ordinary diabetic.<sup>116</sup>

Pregnancy in Relation to Hyperthyroidism.—The thyroid frequently enlarges during pregnancy. Although the basal metabolic rate is normal or slightly depressed during the first six months of gestation it rises thereafter to somewhat above normal levels at term and then returns rapidly to the pre-pregnancy level.<sup>117</sup> The serum protein bound iodine rises during normal pregnancy to 9 to 11 micrograms per cent in the absence of any evidences of thyrotoxicosis. Hyperthyroidism is a rather infrequent complication of pregnancy being encountered in less than 0.2 per cent.<sup>117, 118, 119</sup>

Although the administration of thyroid extract is often advocated as a treatment for sterility the fecundity of patients with hyperthyroidism is not noteworthy. Mussey<sup>118</sup> reported only 42 pregnancies in 7,228 female patients with hyperthyroidism (0.6 per cent). The severity of the hyperthyroidism may increase or decrease during pregnancy but generally it remains unaltered. The fetus is usually unaffected by the thyrotoxic state of the mother although a case of a child born to a hyperthyroid mother has been reported.<sup>120</sup> The incidence of toxemias of pregnancy appears to be somewhat increased in patients with thyrotoxicosis as does the frequency of spontaneous abortion.<sup>117, 122</sup> Thyrotoxicosis per se does not constitute an indication for interruption of pregnancy. With proper treatment the hyperthyroid state may be readily controlled and the pregnancy carried to a successful termination. Thyroidectomy is well tolerated.<sup>118, 119, 122, 123</sup>

The risk attendant upon the surgery in these instances is no greater than that in the non-pregnant hyperthyroid women. In general where surgery is decided upon it is preferably performed during the first half of gestation. Today hyperthyroidism occurring at any stage of pregnancy may be safely and satisfactorily treated with the goitrogens.<sup>121, 124</sup> With these agents the hyperthyroidism may be well controlled and if the mother is maintained at euthyroid levels no deleterious effects occur in the child.<sup>120, 124</sup> In a few instances some thyroidal enlargement has been observed in the newborn infant but this subsides at a later date.<sup>122</sup>

Breast-feeding, however, should be avoided since the thyroid compounds are excreted in the milk.<sup>125</sup> The use of radioactive iodine is perhaps fraught with some hazard since the fetal thyroid begins to collect iodine during the fourteenth week of life.<sup>126</sup> Theoretically it would therefore be possible to treat the mother with radioactive isotopes before this period with safety to the fetus. However at present it is wiser to reserve this form of therapy to the nonpregnant thyrotoxic patients.

Prethibial (Localized) Myxedema—Prethibial myxedema is relatively uncommon.<sup>127</sup> The lesion occurs almost invariably in patients with severe or malignant exophthalmos.<sup>220</sup> The frequency of this syndrome bears no relationship to the severity of the thyrotoxicosis and indeed often occurs after subtotal thyroidectomy.<sup>4, 129, 135, 136</sup> It appears in painless symmetrical patches of variable size but of definite outline on the anterior aspects of the lower half of the legs or the dorsal surfaces of the feet. It has been described on the face, eyelids and scrotum. The skin overlying the lesions is thickened and pigskin like in appearance and red, cyanotic or yellow white in color. It does not pit on pressure but will dimple following the local injection of hyaluronidase.<sup>41, 128</sup> This would suggest that in part at least the involved area is infiltrated with a mucoproteinous material containing hyaluronic acid. The microscopic examination of the lesion reveals the presence of edema and a mucoid degeneration of the corium secondary to a basophilic alteration of the collagen and elastin.<sup>134, 13</sup>

The cause of the development of pretibial myxedema is unknown. Because of its frequent association with severe exophthalmos, it is probable that they have a common underlying mechanism. The treatment for pretibial myxedema as for severe exophthalmos is unsatisfactory. Occasionally the former will subside spontaneously. Any measures which reduce the basal metabolic rate will generally increase the severity of the lesions.<sup>4</sup> Iodine, thyroid extract and thyroxine however are equally ineffective. The systemic and local use of generous amounts of cortisone may result in some remission of the lesions.<sup>2, 9</sup>

Thyroid Storm — The extreme manifestations of thyrotoxicosis are exhibited in the clinical picture known as thyroid storm. In this state the overwhelming thyroid intoxication results in marked restlessness, delirium, tachycardia, vomiting and diarrhea, dehydration and hyperpyrexia. Death frequently ensues. In some patients however the manifestations may be chiefly those of prostration, hypotonia and mental apathy and the temperature may not rise above 101° F. Thyroid storm may follow stress of any sort in a patient with thyrotoxicosis. It is more likely to occur in severe hyperthyroidism. Ordinarily storm is divided into two main categories referred to as medical and surgical storm. We must emphasize that this is an artificial classification since the clinical manifestations are the same in both groups. Medical storm may occur when the thyrotoxicosis becomes increasingly more severe or when a coincident infection sets in. Surgical storm may follow thyroidectomy for Graves disease or follow any surgical procedure however minor.<sup>140</sup> Following thyroidectomy storm is more likely to occur if the hyperthyroidism has been inadequately controlled before operation. This is particularly true where the nutrition is poor and there has been a failure to gain weight.<sup>139</sup> The presence of a complicating illness such as infection or heart disease further increases the risk. It has been suggested that part of the picture of storm reflects the effect of thyroxine on the heart and the sensitivity of the thyrotoxic heart to epinephrine-like compounds.<sup>141, 142</sup> The cerebral symptoms encountered resemble those observed in anoxic monia. The brain in hyperthyroidism appears to be markedly sensitive to anoxia.<sup>147, 148</sup> Waldenstrom<sup>9</sup> has suggested that the acute meningoencephalopathies constitute a variety of spastic storm which he attributes to depletion of the body iodine stores. Others<sup>149</sup> have postulated that storm is associated with hypothyroidism and that both thyrotoxicosis<sup>149</sup> and thyroid storm may be improved following the administration of thyroxine. The evidence for these theses is meager.

The pathologic findings in thyroid storm are minimal apart from those ordinarily encountered in hyperthyroidism. Not infrequently bronchopneumonia is present. Central necrosis and fatty degeneration of the liver were observed in 10 of 11 patients in one series.<sup>14</sup> It is important to note the high incidence of cardiovascular disease in fatal cases of thyroid storm.

The Treatment of Storm—Thyroid storm usually occurs within four to sixteen hours following subtotal thyroidectomy. In thyrotoxic patients subjected to non thyroidal surgery, delayed storm may occur as a consequence of a late postoperative complication. Prophylaxis is the single most important measure in reducing the incidence of thyroid storm. Patients with hyperthyroidism, particularly those who are severely toxic must be treated promptly and vigorously until brought to euthyroid levels. The treatment of thyrotoxicosis is discussed in detail elsewhere, but it is important to emphasize at the moment that where radioactive iodine is employed for treatment it should be followed by hygozation or the administration of a goitrogen in order that amelioration of the disease be brought about promptly. In the presence of any infection the administration of antibiotics in adequate dosage is indicated. If surgery is to be carried out it must await satisfactory control of the hyperthyroid state.

The active treatment of storm is as follows. The patient is promptly placed in an oxygen tent and iodine is administered both orally and intravenously. The former is given in the form of Lugol's solution in a dose of 50 to 40 drops, and repeated every four to six hours. In addition 1.0 gram of sodium iodide is given intravenously with similar frequency. As the acute symptoms subside these medications are decreased in dosage and administered less often. Although propylthiouracil has been recommended by some in the treatment of thyroid storm it is unlikely that this will have any immediate effect on the crisis but will decrease the amount of circulating thyroid hormone during the period following the acute episode. The antibiotics are routinely used even if infection is not obviously present. It is desirable to employ wet packs, ice bags and other physical measures for decreasing the body temperature and increasing the dissipation of body heat. A continuous intravenous drip of 5 per cent glucose in normal saline is administered to combat the dehydration and to increase the glycogen content of the liver. Blood transfusions are given if indicated. The use of adrenal cortical replacement therapy represents an important measure in the management of thyroid storm.<sup>15,16</sup> For this purpose 100 mgm. of hydrocortisone should be given intravenously every four to six hours during the acute manifestations of the syndrome. Adequate sedation plays an important role in the treatment of storm. Enough sedation including morphine, paraldehyde, chloral hydrate, bromides or barbiturates is employed to control the restlessness and agitation.

The Diagnosis of Hyperthyroidism—The diagnosis of hyperthyroidism is usually clinically evident and where it is obscure the laboratory procedures described in the previous chapter should be resorted to.<sup>131-139, 192-197, 221</sup> It is important to differentiate hypermetabolic states without hyperthyroidism from true thyrotoxicosis. In the former there is an increase in the basal metabolic rate, but none of the clinical manifestations of hyperthyroidism are present. Such cases are encountered in 1 disorders of the blood forming organs: severe anemia, polycythemia, leukemia, multiple myeloma, Hodgkin's disease, lymphosarcoma, 2 cardiac disorders: congestive heart failure, some cases of hypertension, arteriovenous aneurysm, 3 malignant tumors with or without metastases, 4 extensive skin diseases with erythroderma, and 5 Paget's disease of bone. Patients with pheochromocytoma will often manifest an increase in the basal metabolic rate which may be associated with true mild hyperthyroidism or with hypermetabolism without clinical hyperthyroidism. Silver and his colleagues<sup>127</sup> studied a group of patients with hypermetabolism and found that the plasma protein bound iodine and the urinary excretion of radioactive iodine were well within the normal range despite elevations of the metabolic rate to levels as high as +91 per cent.

Neurocirculatory asthenia must be differentiated from Graves' disease. The former is characterized by dyspnea, precordial pain, palpitation, exhaustion, and an inability to adjust to mental or physical strain. There are of course no organic evidences of heart disease. Moschcowitz and Bernstein<sup>128</sup> have suggested that neurocirculatory asthenia is a precursor of Graves' disease, but most observers deny this. Where the clinical differentiation is not certain, the determination of the protein bound iodine or tracer studies with radioactive iodine will separate the two groups.

An important differential diagnosis of Graves' disease is that of thyrotoxicosis due to the ingestion of thyroid extract. Thyrotoxicosis factitia is differentiated from true hyperthyroidism by the fact that although the serum protein bound iodine is elevated in both groups, the uptake of radioactive iodine is decreased and its urinary excretion markedly increased in the former state. Following the ingestion of thyroid extract, the functional activity of the thyroid gland is reduced and its behavior in respect to radioactive iodine may approach that of hypothyroidism. The oral administration of considerable amounts of thyroid extract or triiodothyronine for a period of one to two weeks has been used to distinguish borderline instances of hyperthyroidism from that of non-toxic goiter. In the former group, the daily administration of as much as 9 grams of thyroid extract or 70 to 150 micrograms of triiodothyronine failed to result in a decrease in the thyroidal uptake of  $I_{131}$  below 20 per cent after 24 hours. In the non-toxic group this procedure generally results in a reduction in the uptake of radioactive iodine to levels below 20 per cent.<sup>129, 130</sup>

The Treatment of Graves' Disease—Thyrotoxicosis may be treated either by medical or surgical means. The latter usually consists of subtotal thyroidectomy after the patient has been suitably prepared. The accepted modes of medical treatment include the use of iodine, the thiourea derivatives, or the administration of radioactive iodine.

Although iodine had been employed in the treatment of hyperthyroidism as early as the nineteenth century, its use in this disorder had fallen into disrepute. Plummer<sup>131</sup> in 1923 again suggested its use, particularly in the operative management of thyrotoxicosis. From that time until the introduction of the thiourea derivatives, it remained the drug of choice both for the preparation of patients for operation and for more prolonged conservative management. The latter use was generally and commendably avoided except in instances of very mild hyperthyroidism and in patients with severe or potentially malignant exophthalmos. The administration of iodine is followed within a few days by beginning subjective and objective improvement. Within ten days to three weeks the tachycardia usually subsides, a gain in weight takes place, the patient becomes much less apprehensive and agitated, and the basal metabolic rate has returned to a reasonable level.<sup>11</sup> During iodine therapy the gland becomes somewhat firmer and histologic section at this time reveals considerable involutionary changes with a decrease in the hyperplasia. The invaginated follicles become rounder and now contain colloid, and the lining epithelium becomes flatter.<sup>127</sup> The Golgi apparatus changes in position from a site close to the blood supply to one nearer the follicles. In addition to the decrease in the basal metabolic rate, the blood cholesterol tends to rise and the serum protein bound iodine to fall. However, despite the improvement the patients still appear hyperthyroid and are by no means as well controlled as are those adequately prepared with the thiourea derivatives or after treatment with radioactive iodine or successful surgery. The fall in the basal metabolic rate following the administration of iodine approximates the thyroxine decay curve.<sup>193-195</sup> The maximum response to be expected is a fall of approximately 3 to 4.5 per cent a day.<sup>195, 196</sup> The mechanism by which these effects of iodine are brought about has not been entirely explained. However, some light has been thrown on this subject. Rawson and his coworkers<sup>198, 199</sup> have shown that thyrotropin is inactivated by iodine. Our experimental studies, however, would suggest that iodine prevents the access of thyrotropin to the thyroid as a result of which thyrotropin appears in increasing amounts in the circulation.<sup>199</sup> Chaikoff and Wolff have demonstrated that when the level of the inorganic iodine in the blood is elevated, there is a decrease in the synthesis of organic iodine, although the gland is still capable of trapping inorganic iodine.<sup>180-191</sup> It would seem likely, therefore, that there occurs a decrease in the conversion of diiodotyrosine to thyroid hormone.<sup>19</sup> It is possible, therefore, that iodine exercises its therapeutic effects by either inactivating thyrotropin or preventing its access to the thyroid and by depressing the formation of organic iodine compounds. It is important to note that iodine does not affect the circulating thyroid hormone. This is evidenced by the fact that it exercises no influence on the symptoms of thyroid intoxication induced by the exogenous administration of thyroid hormone.<sup>21</sup> The prolonged use of iodine in patients with hyperthyroidism may be associated with exacerbations of the disease. Following withdrawal of the medication for a period of several weeks to several months, the disease again becomes responsive to iodine medication. Thompson and his coworkers demonstrated that the daily minimum completely effective dose of iodine was 6 mgm., or 1 drop of Lugol's solution. Amounts less than this induced only a submaximal response, while a larger dosage was of no greater therapeutic efficacy.<sup>22</sup> The route of administration is a matter of indifference, as is the chemical form in which it is given. Thus, potassium or sodium iodide, elementary iodine, Lugol's solution,<sup>23</sup> or even diiodotyrosine, are equally effective.<sup>24</sup>

Rienhoff<sup>149</sup> has reported that the administration of desiccated thyroid extract to patients with thyrotoxicosis will bring about a remission of the symptoms and enable these patients to be safely operated upon. Such glands however do not reveal the colloid involution which follows the use of more orthodox forms of iodine.<sup>149</sup> It is suggested by this author that the administration of thyroid extract in these instances causes thyroid atrophy presumably as the result of the inhibition of thyrotropin. The amount of iodine in the dosage of thyroid extract employed (0.00132 mgm iodine per gram of thyroid) appears to be too small to exert any true iodine effect. The mechanism involved is further elucidated by the observation of Cortell and Rawson<sup>150</sup> who have shown that exogenous thyroxine not only inhibits the formation of thyrotropin but decreases the action of thyrotropin on the thyroid.

The question of iodine induced thyrotoxicosis (Jod Basedow) is a controversial one. Although such cases have been reported especially in areas of endemic goiter abroad in our experience and in the experience of most observers in this country its occurrence is questionable.<sup>212, 213</sup> The explanation for the development of Jod Basedow is based on the concept that a goiter long deprived of iodine when furnished with this substance produces thyroid hormone in excess and clinical thyrotoxicosis results. However when iodine prophylaxis for goiter was introduced into the United States no increase in thyrotoxicosis was noted. It seems more likely to us that in regions of endemic goiter where iodine deficiency has been long sustained those patients who ordinarily might have toxic goiter would presumably be unable to manufacture the hormone because of iodine lack. When iodine is then given for prophylaxis of the goiter the overt evidences of latent hyperthyroidism may then become manifest.

Lugol's solution is generally administered in a dosage of 1 to 10 minims 3 times a day. This may be given in milk or in orange juice to disguise the taste. In some instances hyperthyroidism can be controlled indefinitely by the administration of Lugol's solution. However such instances are comparatively few and are limited to the relatively mild case of thyrotoxicosis. Prior to the introduction of the thiourea derivatives most clinicians employed iodine chiefly for the preoperative preparation of the thyrotoxic patients. The introduction of the goitrogens and radioactive iodine into clinical medicine has to a great extent supplanted the use of iodine. It is still employed however in those patients who are prepared for operation with the thiourea derivatives. The gland of patients treated with the goitrogens is generally friable and vascular thus increasing the technical difficulties attendant upon its removal. The administration of iodine for ten days prior to the operation in conjunction with the goitrogen will induce involution of the gland and facilitate the surgical procedure.<sup>151</sup>

The introduction of the thiourea derivatives constituted an important advance in the treatment of hyperthyroidism. Following the demonstration by Astwood and his group<sup>207</sup> and by the Mackenzies<sup>152</sup> of the goitrogenic and hypothyroid inducing potentialities of these drugs the application to clinical hyperthyroidism rapidly followed.<sup>208</sup> On the basis of experimental studies on the relative efficacy and toxicity of a large number of compounds thiouracil and thiothiourea were chosen for use in the earlier investigations in the treatment of clinical thyrotoxicosis.<sup>29</sup> Most of these studies centered on the use of thiouracil while relatively few employed thiouracil in part perhaps because of the unpleasant breath imparted by the latter. It soon became apparent that these drugs in sufficient dosage would invariably reduce the metabolic rate to euthyroid or even hypothyroid levels. The chief difficulty, however, was the relatively high incidence of toxic reactions.<sup>22, 23, 24, 25</sup>

Within a few days after beginning of treatment with the thiouracil derivatives the patient will note an increase in the sense of well being, although no objective evidence of improvement has yet occurred. Within two to four weeks the basal metabolic rate will return to normal levels and most of the clinical manifestations of thyrotoxicosis will subside. The tachycardia, as a rule, persists somewhat longer than the other signs and symptoms. The subsidence of the symptoms and the fall in basal metabolic rate usually proceed at a somewhat slower pace than is observed with the use of iodine. It is reported that the rate of fall of the basal metabolic rate is approximately one per cent a day, although in our experience it has been more rapid. In general it may require a period of four to six weeks or even longer to control the disease satisfactorily. The response is more rapid in young people, in patients with diffuse rather than nodular goiter and in hyperthyroidism of short duration. In contrast to the results obtained with iodine, with the thiouracil derivatives the basal metabolic rate may be reduced to any desired level. This is of great importance where patients are to be prepared for operation. All such patients treated with the thiouracil compounds may be brought to euthyroid levels and operated upon with the maximum protection against the development of thyroid storm. The administration of iodine before treatment with the goitrogens will delay the effect of the latter. Following the ingestion of the thiouracil derivatives the goiter initially enlarges but subsequently often becomes smaller. This initial enlargement is a matter of concern in patients with substernal goiters. Such patients when treated with these compounds must be carefully watched for the development of respiratory difficulties.

The thiouracil compounds may be used for the definitive treatment of hyperthyroidism or for the preparation of the patient for subtotal thyroidectomy. In the latter instance the drug is administered until euthyroid levels are reached and the criteria for proper surgical preparation are fulfilled. This may take from four to six weeks or even longer. For the more definitive treatment of hyperthyroidism it has been found that these compounds must be continued for periods of time varying from twelve to eighteen months. If treatment is of shorter duration the symptoms usually recur on cessation of therapy, often within two to eight weeks.<sup>22, 23, 25</sup> The incidence of permanent remissions increases with the more prolonged periods of therapy. Indeed remissions up to four and five years have been reported.<sup>26, 27</sup> However the longer the period of observation following cessation of therapy, the less the percentage of permanent cure. Meulen-gracht and Hjerulf-Jensen<sup>28</sup> obtained prolonged remissions in 90 per cent of a series of 110 patients. Similar results in even larger series were reported by Poate<sup>21</sup> and Irish.<sup>22</sup> However the percentage of prolonged remissions was far less in reports emanating from clinics in this country.<sup>24</sup> emphasized however that leukopenia does not necessarily herald agranulocytosis since the leukopenia frequently disappears despite continuation of therapy. Agranulocytosis usually occurs between the fourth to eighth weeks of treatment but instances have been reported after as short a period as seven days of treatment and as long a time as a year of therapy. In one instance agranulocytosis occurred six months after cessation of treatment. Drug fever is encountered in 27 per cent and dermatitis in 33 per cent. The fever almost invariably occurs on the tenth to the eighteenth day of treatment. When the drug is withdrawn the temperature promptly falls but rises again if it is readministered. Other less common toxic effects include lymphadenopathy, swelling of the salivary glands, arthritis and rarely periarteritis-nodosa. Jaundice and liver damage have been observed chiefly in association with agranulocytosis.

Thiouracil is administered in a dosage of 400 to 600 mgm a day until the basal metabolic rate falls to within the normal range. It is then given in a maintenance dosage which varies in different patients from 50 to 200 mgm daily. The drug is best given in divided doses 3 times a day and blood counts should be performed twice a week.

Thiourea in large doses has been found to be effective but unfortunately frequently gives rise to toxic side effects identical with those observed with thiouracil. However by employing iodine in conjunction with this compound Danowski and his associates<sup>4, 21</sup> were able to employ smaller amounts of this drug. With the combined therapy they encountered only 2 instances of toxic reactions that of drug fever in a series of over 100 patients. Unfortunately the hyperthyroidism was not controlled in all instances. It is possible therefore that thiourea may be better tolerated than thiouracil but it is hardly the ideal goitrogen. Thiourea is usually administered in a dosage of 1 to 3 grams a day. When given in conjunction with iodine Danowski and his group<sup>4, 21</sup> obtained satisfactory results with 200 mgm a day.

Methyl thiouracil has been extensively used for the treatment of thyrotoxicosis<sup>22a, 23, 26, 27, 28, 29</sup>. It is twice as active as thiouracil and can be given in doses of 200 to 400 mgm a day. Bartels<sup>26</sup> reports toxic manifestations in 9 per cent of the patients of whom 1.5 per cent developed agranulocytosis. The results described by other investigators have been somewhat more favorable<sup>22a, 23, 26, 27, 28, 29</sup>. The clinical effects are perhaps more rapidly induced with methyl thiouracil. The usual precautionary measures must be employed with this agent as with the other goitrogens. Blood studies with particular emphasis on the white blood cell count and differential studies should be done twice a week.

Propyl thiouracil in our experience is a satisfactory compound for the treatment of hyperthyroidism. The incidence of toxic reactions is approximately 2 per cent.<sup>24, 29, 27, 28, 30</sup> Agranulocytosis is uncommon but does occur. Bartels<sup>26</sup> reports the incidence of this complication to be 0.6 per cent. The drug is usually administered in a dosage of 200 to 600 mgm a day in 3 divided doses and progressively reduced in amount when the basal metabolic rate returns to normal levels. The usual maintenance dose varies from 50 to 150 mgm a day. White blood cell counts and differential studies should be performed twice a week.

Tapazole (1 Methyl 2 Mercaptoimidazole) Methimazole, Mercazole is very effective in the management of hyperthyroidism. According to McGraw<sup>325</sup> the initial daily dose varies from 1 to 60 mgm and the maintenance dose from 2.5 to 30 mgm. The incidence of toxic reaction reported by this group is approximately 4 per cent.

Iodo 2 thiouracil or Itrunil is used in an initial daily dose of 200 to 400 mgm with a daily maintenance dose of 70 to 200 mgm. The incidence of toxic reactions with this agent is somewhat greater than that with tapazole.<sup>326</sup>

Carbimazole (2 carbethoxythio-1 methylglyoxime) neomercazole which is related to tapazole is used initially in a dosage of 30 to 40 mg daily and its maintenance dose is 5 to 10 mgm. It is reported to be less toxic than tapazole particularly at high dosage levels.<sup>327</sup> A good many other thiouracil and thiouracil preparations including thiobribital, tetramethyl thiouracil, diethyl thiouracil, 6 dimethyl thiouracil, 2 thio-4, 5 dimethyl 6 methyl ethyl pyrimidine have been employed clinically but have not been found to be entirely satisfactory generally because of the frequency and severity of the toxic reactions.<sup>328, 329, 330</sup>

Aminothiazol, introduced by the French for the treatment of thyrotoxicosis<sup>331</sup> was found to be unsatisfactory by English and American observers because of the frequency of toxic reactions.<sup>24, 298, 300</sup> Parasanthine<sup>61</sup> and para aminobenzoic acid<sup>62</sup> have been advocated for the treatment of hyperthyroidism. These agents however were found to be clinically ineffective by Williams.<sup>332</sup>

The results of the surgical treatment of hyperthyroidism are excellent in the properly prepared patient. Following preparation with the goitrogens with or without the adjuvant use of iodine the mortality rate need not exceed 0.24 per cent.<sup>3</sup> Pemberton<sup>2</sup> reported 611 patients with diffuse toxic goiter who were subjected to subtotal thyroidectomy without any fatalities. Of 496 cases of toxic nodular goiter operated upon 2 patients died. The combined mortality rate of the two groups was 0.18 per cent. Permanent cure is effected in 92 per cent of the patients.<sup>3</sup> In 1000 cases operated upon since 1943 and reported by Cattel<sup>3</sup> the complications encountered were as follows: postoperative hemorrhage 2.7 per cent, tracheotomy 1.3 per cent, hypothyroidism 4.5 per cent, tetany 1.5 per cent, recurrent laryngeal nerve injury 1.0 per cent, recurrence of hyperthyroidism 2.4 per cent, total mortality rate 0.2 per cent. It is interesting to note the decrease in mortality from that of the iodine period 1923 to 1943 during which time 1 per cent of the patients died postoperatively. The results obtained with surgery are of course in good part dependent on the competence of the surgeon. The recurrence rate of hyperthyroidism after subtotal thyroidectomy has been reported to vary from 2.3 to 17.5 per cent.<sup>3-5</sup>

The proper preparation of the patient for operation is as important and integral a part of the treatment as is the subsequent surgical procedure. Proper preoperative preparation requires that the patient be brought to euthyroid levels, that he gain weight and that the tachycardia subside. The period of preparation varies considerably with the patient. Hysteria must never be a consideration and the duration of the preoperative treatment may vary from four weeks to several months. Most effective preparation is obtained with the use of one of the goitrogens. In addition Lugol's solution is added to the regimen for ten days before the operation. Both agents are continued for one week after the operation. The use of ample sedation to allay the anxieties and fears of the patient as well as the ingestion of a high calorie diet augmented with orally administered members of the vitamin B Complex are recommended as part of the preparatory regimen.

Postoperative hypothyroidism or myxedema is easily treated. It is important to be cognizant of the early signs such as a sensation of coldness, aches and pains, fatigue and listlessness. The administration of thyroid hormone will restore these patients to euthyroidism.

Postoperative hemorrhage may occur even with the most meticulous and competent surgeon. The symptoms suggesting hemorrhage in the wound are the presence of a mass and the sudden onset of dyspnea. The suspicion of the diagnosis warrants immediate re-exploration of the neck and ligation of the bleeding vessel. Tracheotomy may occasionally be necessary.

Recurrent nerve injury results in the loss of voice or hoarseness. At first a flaccid paralysis of the vocal cord is observed and the position of the affected cord is cadaveric. Later spasticity occurs and the cord assumes a midline position. It is for this reason that bilateral nerve injury results in respiratory obstruction. At the Lahey Clinic exposure of the recurrent laryngeals during the operative procedure reduced the incidence of injury to these nerves by two-thirds.<sup>13</sup> With unilateral recurrent nerve injury the voice may improve over a period of three to twelve weeks. If the injury is due to edema full recovery generally takes place. In patients with bilateral nerve injury respiratory obstruction does not occur for several hours. Tracheotomy should be performed as soon as respiratory difficulties become evident. At a later date re-exploration of the neck is indicated in an attempt to correct the cause of the nerve injury. Ultimately if no improvement is afforded by the secondary operation a plastic operation on the cords may provide an adequate airway.<sup>12</sup>

The use of x-ray therapy was for the most part abandoned following the introduction of iodine in the preoperative treatment of hyperthyroidism. A considerable percentage of patients with hyperthyroidism can be cured by x-ray treatment. Soley and Stone<sup>14</sup> in a series of 43 patients reported cure in more than one-half following x-ray treatment. Another 20 per cent were improved.<sup>15</sup> In addition they claimed that radiation therapy had less of a deleterious effect on exophthalmos than did surgery. Much earlier Means and Holmes<sup>16</sup> had reported cure in one third of their patients and improvement in another third. Pfahler<sup>17</sup> collected several thousand cases from the literature and stated that cure was obtained in approximately two-thirds of the group and improvement in another 20 per cent. However with the advent of radioactive iodine the x-ray treatment has been entirely discarded.

Radioactive iodine has proven to be an effective form of treatment for hyperthyroidism and it is possible that in most instances it may replace the other forms of therapy available today. The isotope employed is  $I_{131}$  and the dosage is dependent on 1) the percentage uptake of iodine by the gland, and 2—the size of the gland. The former may be estimated by tracer studies. The latter obviously can be calculated only grossly. As a guide it is perhaps desirable to remember that a thyroid gland which is just barely palpable weighs approximately 25 to 30 grams. It is not by any means certain that the same dose of irradiation will produce the same degree of destruction in the thyroid glands of different individuals. Consequently any calculations based on these factors constitute only a rough approximation. Haines and his associates employ a formula for calculating the dosage required:<sup>27</sup>

Similar methods of calculation are employed by other investigators.<sup>28, 29, 30</sup> However, most investigators employ an arbitrary dose of radioactive iodine per gram of estimated thyroid weight.<sup>28, 29, 30</sup> It is interesting to note that satisfactory results have been obtained with amounts of  $I_{131}$  which vary from 23 to 574 microcuries per gram of gland.<sup>30</sup> The amount which is generally employed is approximately 120–150 microcuries per gram of thyroid weight.<sup>30</sup> This has been estimated to represent approximately 3000 to 15,000 or more roentgen equivalents (r.p.) to the thyroid.<sup>31</sup>

Feitelberg and his coworkers<sup>28</sup> reported the results obtained in 184 patients with hyperthyroidism treated with radioactive iodine. The average total amount employed for the initial treatment was 8.2 millicuries. Of this group, 132 patients required one treatment, 43 required a second dose, and 9 patients required 3 treatments. Almost 100 per cent of the patients were cured of the disease. Improvement is gradual—but an appreciable change is usually not evident in less than three or four weeks after the administration of the radioactive iodine. Approximately four to twelve weeks elapse after treatment before maximum therapeutic results are evident. If at the end of this period satisfactory results are not achieved, a second dose of radioactive iodine is administered. Occasionally during the first two weeks after treatment an exacerbation of the symptoms and a rise in the serum protein bound iodine is noted. This may be due to destruction of the gland and the outpouring of the preformed thyroid hormone.<sup>37, 273</sup> At times cough and soreness of the throat may occur. Radiation sickness is rare with  $I_{131}$ .<sup>37</sup> Permanent hypothyroidism or myxedema is reported in 5 to 7 per cent.<sup>37, 31</sup> Transient hypothyroidism occurs in an additional small number. In a panel discussion involving approximately 2000 patients with hyperthyroidism,<sup>29</sup> it was the consensus that (1) the cure rate is almost 100 per cent, (2) the average initial treatment dose varies from 1 to 8 millicuries depending upon the size of the gland and the age of the individual, the older patients in general requiring the larger amounts, (3) multiple doses at eight to 12 week intervals or longer are frequently required, (4) nodular toxic goiter requires a somewhat larger dose than is effective in diffuse toxic goiter, (5) hypothyroidism occurs in 7 to 13 per cent of the patients treated. Soley, Miller and Foreman<sup>31</sup> found an increase in the measured exophthalmos in 30 per cent of patients treated with radioactive iodine, as compared to an incidence of 26 per cent following a thyrotoxic therapy and 40 to 50 per cent after subtotal thyroidectomy.

Malignant exophthalmos can occur after treatment with radioactive iodine<sup>219</sup>

The question has been raised as to whether radioactive iodine may even ~~truly cause an carcinogenic effect~~. It is for this reason that many clinicians restrict the use of this agent to patients over forty years of age. No proof that this has occurred has been produced to date. However in a study concerned with the histologic changes in the human thyroid following various forms of internal and external irradiation Lindsay Duley and Jones<sup>221</sup> report the following:

"(1) The lesions observed in thyroid glands irradiated with  $I_{131}$  or x rays radon or neutrons were qualitatively similar. Acute epithelial injury associated with necrotizing vasculitis and thrombosis was the initial lesion resulting from high dosage irradiation. Follicular atrophy accompanied by perifollicular fibrosis was characteristic of the late reaction produced by irradiation.

(2) Bizarre thyroid epithelial cells with hyperchromatic nuclei were observed in many irradiated glands particularly the hyperplastic ones. The cellular changes were believed due to overstimulation and exhaustion rather than to the direct effect of irradiation. Cellular change due to irradiation were found only in glands subject to high dosage of irradiation and examined relatively soon after the exposure.

(3) A significantly high incidence of Hashimoto thyroiditis was found in hyperplastic thyroid glands irradiated with  $I_{131}$  or x rays. This lesion was regarded as one effect of irradiation of the hyperplastic gland. The epithelial proliferative reaction in 2 of the glands led to the late development of multiple adenomas.

The chief contraindications to the use of radioactive iodine in pregnancy and lactation although the agent can perhaps be employed with a reasonable degree of safety prior to the 14th week of gestation since the fetal thyroid does not collect iodine prior to this time.

excluded on the basis of the presence of thyroid hyperactivity. Carcinoma of the thyroid may occur in patients with Graves' disease with a diffusely and smoothly enlarged gland. Its incidence in this group is exceedingly low. Ward<sup>4</sup> found only 1 such case in 1900 patients with diffuse toxic goiter but Pemberton and Black<sup>5</sup> found 14 cases in 3500 patients, an incidence of 0.4 per cent. Cole and his group<sup>6</sup> found an incidence of 0.2 per cent in 517 patients.

The greatest incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid is to be found in patients with solitary nodular goiters. When the group of nontoxic nodular goiter is further subdivided into those with solitary nodules and those with multiple nodules, it is found that the frequency of carcinoma in nodular goiters is due in greater part to the great frequency with which it is encountered in the goiters with solitary nodules. Thus in Crile's group<sup>3</sup> of 274 cases of nodular nontoxic goiter 3.4 per cent of the multinodular goiters had carcinoma in contrast to 2.4 per cent in the cases with solitary nodules. In the 285 patients with nontoxic nodular goiter reported by Cole and his group<sup>6</sup> 2.4 per cent of the cases with solitary thyroid nodules and 9.8 per cent of the group with multiple nodules had carcinoma. Of the patients with solitary nodules reported by Ward<sup>4</sup> 15.6 per cent had carcinoma in contrast to 4.8 per cent in the entire group of nodular goiters. Nineteen per cent of the 156 patients with solitary nodules reported by Cope and his group<sup>7</sup> showed malignant changes.

On the basis of these studies we would summarize the incidence of malignancy of the thyroid essentially as follows:

- 1 Carcinoma of the thyroid may occur probably coincidentally in patients with diffuse toxic goiter (Graves' disease). The incidence is exceedingly low, in general being less than 0.5 per cent.
- 2 Carcinoma of the thyroid may occur in patients with toxic nodular goiter. Its incidence in this group is greater than that in the toxic diffuse goiter but is still low, and in general is less than 2 per cent.
- 3 The incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid in patients with multiple nodular nontoxic goiter varies in the literature from 3 to 10 per cent.
- 4 The incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid in patients with a solitary nontoxic nodule varies in the literature from 1.5 to 2.5 per cent.
- 5 On the basis of very limited reports the incidence of carcinoma in children with nontoxic nodular goiters is greater than 19 per cent.<sup>4,8</sup>
- 6 The incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid in males with nodular goiters is considerably greater than that of females.<sup>4,9</sup>

In evaluating the significance of the data cited above it must be remembered that these statistics are based on a highly selected group of patients. The cases reported represent patients who have been operated upon and therefore have finally arrived at this stage through a rather extensive screening process. By far and large, although not always so, they have been subjected to surgery for some compelling reason other than a prophylactic one. In most instances the mass in the neck had grown or produced uncomfortable symptoms or aroused the suspicions of the referring physician. In this sense such patients represent a selected population and the statistical conclusions achieved from their study are not necessarily representative of the group with nodular goiter as a whole.

Chapter 27

TUMORS OF THE THYROID GLAND

MODULAR GOITER BENIGN AND MALIGNANT THYROID TUMORS ENDEMIC AND SPORADIC (COLLOID) GOITER THYROGLOSSAL DUCT CYSTS AMYLOID GOITER

Nodular Goiter — The enlarged nodular thyroid gland may be the seat of hyperactivity or it may cause pressure symptoms because of its size and location but its major significance is concerned with the possible presence of malignancy. Occasionally a carcinoma of the thyroid is readily recognized clinically. Often it is suspected because of the hard quality of the mass in question. Generally however the solitary nodule and the multinodular goiter present no particularly distinguishing features to suggest malignancy other than its statistical incidence. The incidence of malignancy of the thyroid differs in the various forms of goiter. In general it is much more common in the nodular goiters than in the smooth and diffusely enlarged glands. Similarly it is more frequent in the nontoxic nodular goiters than in the toxic ones and finally it is considerably more common in the thyroids with solitary nodules than in the multinodular goiters.

The overall incidence of carcinoma in nodular goiter varies approximately from 4 to 10 per cent. This group includes the multiple and solitary nodules and the toxic and nontoxic groups. Thus Brenizer and McKnight<sup>1</sup> report 2324 cases of combined toxic and nontoxic nodular goiter 4 per cent of whom were proven to have carcinoma of the thyroid. Of 113 similar cases reported by Horn and his group 63 per cent had carcinoma. Crile<sup>2</sup> described 537 cases with an incidence of carcinoma of 5.6 per cent. Ward<sup>3</sup> reported 3539 cases and Cole and his coworkers<sup>4</sup> 663 cases with an incidence of malignancy respectively of 4.8 and 7.2 per cent. Cope and his group<sup>5</sup> reported that of 1109 nodular goiters operated upon 10.1 per cent were found to have malignant lesions. When the group of cases with nodular goiter is subdivided into toxic and nontoxic divisions it is obvious that the incidence of malignancy is considerably greater in the nontoxic group. Thus in the patients cited by Horn and his group above of the 1132 cases 637 were instances of nontoxic nodular goiter and 9.8 per cent of this group had carcinoma while of the 498 patients with toxic nodular goiter only 1.8 per cent had carcinoma. Similarly in the patients reported by Cole and his group<sup>4</sup> of 378 cases of toxic nodular goiter only 1 per cent had carcinoma in contrast to 17.15 per cent of 285 patients with nontoxic nodular goiter. Of 263 patients with toxic nodular goiter reported by Crile<sup>2</sup> none had carcinoma while 10.9 per cent of the nontoxic group were thus afflicted. Thus carcinoma of the thyroid occurs most infrequently in patients with nodular goiters who manifest evidence of hyperthyroidism. But the point to be emphasized is that it does occur and its possibility cannot be entirely were ostensibly normal clinically, found considerable variations among the different age groups. The patients studied varied from birth to the age of eighty years. The gland is tiny at birth weighing approximately 15 grams, and reaches a maximum weight of approximately 50 grams in early adult life. From this point on it gradually decreases in size to an average weight of 20 grams at the age of eighty. During the first few years of life the follicles in the gland are small, round, and of fairly even size and lined by cuboidal epithelium. In the older age group the histologic appearance of the gland tends to revert back again to the infant type. During both infancy and old age there is a considerable amount of interacinar epithelium, which practically disappears during early adulthood.

The structure of the thyroid gland is influenced to a considerable degree by various environmental factors such as diet and by the usual physiologic stresses.<sup>16</sup> This is particularly noticeable during puberty when the physiologic needs for the thyroid hormones are increased. Under such circumstances the development of hypertrophy and hyperplasia of the gland is common and is especially evident in girls of this age group. Iodine lack such as occurs in endemic areas intensifies this problem. The thyroid hormonal requirements vary from period to period and result in concomitant hyperplastic and involutary changes. Thus within a given period of time the gland may develop from a normal structure to a hypertrophied and hyperplastic one, followed by involutionary changes either to the normal state again or by hyperinvolution to the stage of that of the colloid goiter.<sup>17</sup> Marine has suggested that recurrent thyroid hyperplasia may eventually result in exhaustion atrophy.<sup>18,19</sup> This is most clearly seen in the iodine deficiency states where a normal thyroid may become hypertrophied and hyperplastic in an effort to manufacture enough hormone in the presence of iodine lack and may eventually result in exhaustion atrophy on the one hand or a colloid goiter on the other. Actually the same thyroid may show varying degrees of involution and hyperinvolution. A previously hyperplastic gland may have involuted areas of a perfectly normal thyroid structure, and in other regions of the same gland hyperinvolution may result in small colloid nodules.<sup>18,19</sup> The physiologic and environmental variations in hormone requirements which occur with the onset of puberty and thereafter account for the fact that innocent thyroid nodules are uncommon before this period and progressively increase in number and frequency thereafter as the individual grows older.

The involutionary nodule constitutes the largest percentage of the nodules found in the single or multiple nodular goiter. This type of nodule was found in approximately 40 per cent of a group of 96 patients with single nodules in the thyroid reported by Soley, Lindsay, and Dailey.<sup>20</sup> Although colloid goiters are generally diffusely enlarged they are frequently irregular and nodular. On histologic examination there are many normal areas as well as many acini greatly dilated lined with a flat epithelium and filled with dense colloid. These represent involuted acini. In addition there are scattered through such a colloid goiter many small areas of hyperplastic thyroid tissue. Involutionary nodules are therefore the common type of nodules found in nontoxic nodular goiter and indeed they may be present singly or in numbers in otherwise normal glands. These nodules

Not all patients with masses in the neck particularly the small solitary nodules, seek medical advice and by no means are they always urged to be operated upon. When the nodule is small and soft it is a common practice to defer operation for observation. Consequently the ostensibly alarming frequency with which carcinoma of the thyroid occurs in the solitary nodule for example must be viewed in this perspective. Indiscriminate prophylactic surgery could prove to be a herculean undertaking, in view of the fact that in endemic areas the incidence of nodular goiter in autopsy material may be as high as 80 per cent.<sup>10</sup> Even in the New England nonendemic region 8.2 per cent of routine autopsy material revealed the presence of thyroid nodules 1 centimeter or more in size.<sup>11</sup> Such nodules are clinically palpable. Rogers, Asper and Williams<sup>12</sup> approached this problem somewhat differently. They reviewed the records of patients with goiter admitted to 3 large eastern general hospitals. There were 3,221 such patients with goiter admitted to these hospitals. A pathologic diagnosis of malignant neoplasm of the thyroid gland was made in 64 cases or 1.99 per cent. The histologic study was obtained either on autopsy or from surgical material. VanderLan<sup>13</sup> reviewed the autopsy material in 3 Boston hospitals and found that carcinoma of the thyroid was a rare cause of death.

Autopsy material is as unsatisfactory a basis for statistical study of carcinoma of the thyroid as is surgical material. Patients with carcinoma of the thyroid do not necessarily die in hospitals and hence the unusually low statistical incidence of thyroid malignancy in this group is misleading as the excessive incidence in the group of patients operated upon.

The problem of the incidence of carcinoma of the thyroid is a difficult one and it propounds a dilemma which cannot be readily resolved. Even if the disease is not as common as the surgeons would have us believe it occurs with great enough frequency to warrant anxiety and careful judgment. In general it is a wise policy to regard solitary thyroid nodules with suspicion regardless of the age of the individual. Malignant changes are even more common in such nodules in young people than they are in the older age groups. Indeed in nonendemic regions solitary nodules are rare in people under the age of thirty and when present should be regarded most suspiciously.<sup>14</sup> Single nodules therefore should in most cases be removed particularly if they have grown in size and increased in firmness. The propriety of the prophylactic removal of multinodular goiters is more questionable. Since in the diffusely nodular goiter the entire gland is generally the seat of nodules true prophylaxis should call for total thyroidectomy. This is a procedure which is not lightly decided upon and usually therefore partial or subtotal thyroidectomies are performed. Under these circumstances only partial protection is afforded and malignant changes may develop in the nodular tissue left behind.<sup>15</sup> Where the gland increases rapidly in size or produces pressure symptoms or when a certain portion of the gland becomes larger, harder and perhaps more adherent surgery should promptly be resorted to.

Benign Tumors of the Thyroid Gland — The histology of the normal thyroid gland varies with the age of the individual. Rice<sup>16</sup> in a study of 500 thyroids obtained at autopsy from individuals whose thyroid glands both that of adenoma with varying degrees of acinar differentiation and that of involutary nodules with some residual epithelial proliferation. Of importance however is the fact that most nodules in the thyroid are benign. Ninety to 97 per cent of multiple nodular goiters are benign goiters and 75 to 85 per cent of solitary nodules are benign. Of the benign solitary nodules approximately 40 per cent are involutary nodules and therefore probably do not represent new growths while another 20 per cent represent adenomas of one type or another. The remaining group of nodules although benign are difficult to classify.

The uptake of radioactive iodine by the benign tumors varies essentially with the degree of differentiation of the tumor. According to Ranson and his coworkers<sup>4</sup> the highly undifferentiated tumors such as the trabecular and tubular adenomas, collect only minimal amounts of the radioactive isotope. Those showing early differentiation such as the microfollicular adenoma show a greater avidity for radioactive iodine than do the highly undifferentiated tumors. Actually the uptake of the isotope by the tumors was in several instances greater than that of the uninvolved surrounding tissue although in others it was less. Tumors showing intermediate degrees of differentiation such as the micro and macro-follicular adenoma take up varying degrees of radioactive iodine. Some of the tumors take up less radioactive isotope than does the surrounding normal thyroid tissue and others as much or more. The involutary nodules or colloid adenomas in general take up somewhat less iodine than does normal thyroid tissue. Hyperplastic benign tumors of a well-differentiated cell type may take up more radioactive iodine than does normal thyroid tissue and may cause clinical manifestations of hyperthyroidism.

Malignant Tumors of the Thyroid - In a comparatively small percentage of cases the pathologic recognition of malignant thyroid tumors may be difficult. This is in part due to the fact that the criteria for thyroid malignancy are not as well defined as they are for other organs and in part because the clinical course may be inconsistent with the histologic findings. There is no difference of opinion concerning the malignant character of 1 papillary adenocarcinomas 2 follicular and alveolar carcinomas 3 Hurthle-cell adenocarcinomas 4 solid adenocarcinomas 5 small and giant cell carcinomas 6 epidermoid carcinomas and 7 the sarcomas such as the fibro- and lympho-sarcomas.<sup>5</sup> It is important to emphasize that these tumors may not be present in a pure histologic form but rather that considerable pleomorphism occurs.<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless their general malignant character is readily recognizable. The degree of malignancy varies with the different types of tumor. Warren<sup>2</sup> classified the papillary alveolar and Hurthle-cell adenocarcinomas as tumors of moderate malignancy while the small and giant cell carcinomas the epidermoid carcinomas and the fibro- and lympho-sarcomas are classed as highly malignant tumors.

In addition to these definitely malignant tumors there are ostensibly benign thyroid tumors which may sometimes show blood vessel invasion. In this category are the benign thyroid adenomas and the papillary cyst adenoma. Of 1114 thyroid adenomas removed at operation Warren<sup>2</sup> found 3 instances of blood vessel invasion in 67 cases of trabecular and tubular adenomata and in 28 of 505 patients with microfollicular adenomata.

represent involution or hyperinvolution of one or several thyroid lobules which are surrounded by thickened fibrous tissue serving to encapsulate the nodule. On microscopic examination, these nodules are seen to consist of large distended colloid follicles lined with a flat epithelium and encapsulated by fibrous tissue. Incorporated within the nodular area may be found small nests of hypertrophied thyroid tissue. The involutionary nodule is frequently prone to bleeding with a sudden increase in size and the development of pain and tenderness. Subsequent cystic degeneration and calcification are not infrequently observed. In the areas immediately surrounding the involutionary nodules the acini are flattened and compressed. Wegelin<sup>10</sup> refers to the involutionary nodule as struma nodosa macrofollicularis or microfollicular nodules. This type of nodule in view of the nature of its development can hardly be classified as a true adenoma.

Other benign nodules found in the thyroid are classified by Wegelin<sup>10</sup> as follows. Struma nodosa trabecularis or trabecular adenoma. This adenoma consists of cords of cells with ill-defined cell borders closely packed together and resembling the least differentiated embryonal fetal thyroid. The struma nodosa tubularis or tubular adenoma consists of cell cords arranged in tubular form and somewhat less closely packed than the trabecular adenoma. The tubular adenoma is only slightly more mature in structure than the trabecular one. Both tumors are of low functional level as is evidenced by the fact that they take up radioactive iodine poorly<sup>1</sup> and both are frequently referred to as embryonal or fetal adenomas. The struma nodosa microfollicularis or the microfollicular adenoma resembles the thyroid of a newborn infant in appearance.<sup>15</sup> It is made up of small round follicles closely packed together containing little or no colloid and lined by cuboidal epithelium. This is a much more differentiated tumor than the ones described above and according to Rawson<sup>12</sup> is capable of concentrating considerable amounts of radioactive iodine and indeed of producing hyperthyroidism. This tumor is also sometimes referred to as a fetal adenoma. The struma nodosa micro et macrofollicularis or the micro and macrofollicular adenoma is made up of many small follicles lined with cuboidal epithelium and many large ones containing normal appearing colloid and lined with a flat to low cuboidal epithelium. The acini are widely separated by hyaline or fibrous material. These tumors take up radioactive iodine in amounts approximating that of normal thyroid tissue.<sup>1</sup> This tumor is sometimes referred to as a mixed adenoma.<sup>15</sup> The papillary cystadenoma is a benign tumor but it has been known on occasion to show blood vessel invasion and under such circumstances could be considered potentially malignant.<sup>22</sup> These tumors according to Wegelin<sup>10</sup> and Rawson<sup>15</sup> result from diffuse or local hyperplastic changes. On microscopic examination they are seen to consist of hyperplasia of the lining epithelium of a cystic adenoma. The tumor is well encapsulated.

It must be emphasized that the classification of benign tumors outlined above is by no means absolute but is rather one of convenience. There is such considerable histologic overlapping and variation that no available classification today is entirely satisfactory. In 18 per cent of the cases studied by Soley and his coworkers<sup>9</sup> single nodules observed in the thyroid had to be grouped as unclassified since their histologic structure resembled

The thyroid papillary carcinoma typically produce cervical lymph node metastasis but may metastasize more distantly. Bilateral cervical lymph node involvement and mediastinal osseous, intraocular and intracranial metastases have been reported.<sup>2</sup>

Papillary adenocarcinoma is of the thyroid frequently pursue an extremely prolonged clinical course. Patients commonly survive for from ten to twenty five years despite the recurrent cervical lymph node metastases and even in the presence of more distant metastases<sup>2</sup> and eventually die from totally unrelated causes. However not all patients run such an essentially benign course and death may result from local invasion of the larynx, trachea or esophagus or is the result of distant metastases to vital areas. Crile<sup>3</sup> reports 21 patients who have been followed for from five to twenty-one years or until their death. Only 3 have died from their disease, 1 with local recurrence in the thyroid and 2 from distant metastases. These 3 patients lived for nine, fifteen and nineteen years respectively after the original thyroidectomy. One patient who has refused all treatment is living and well twenty-seven years after the appearance of lateral cervical nodules and twenty-one years after these nodules were proved to be papillary adenocarcinoma of the thyroid. Of 89 cases reported by McDermott and his group<sup>4</sup> 73 per cent survived for five years, 60 per cent for ten years and 45 per cent for twenty years or more.

Histologically the tumor is composed of small papillae of vascularized connective tissue projecting into the alveoli. The papillary projections may be covered with several layers of cuboidal or polyhedral epithelial cells varying considerably in size. Foci of solid masses of cells in which no lumen is discernible are encountered in the gland. Mitosis is moderately common and colloid may be present in relatively small amounts.

Titzgerald and Looe<sup>20</sup> investigated the ability of such tumors to take up radioactive iodine. Twenty nine patients with papillary adenocarcinomas were thus studied. Of this group 21 failed to take up any radioactive iodine while in 8 instances there was some concentration of the isotope either in the primary or metastatic lesions or both. In these 8 patients the tumor showed some histologic variations from the predominantly papillary form in that they demonstrated either follicle or alveolar formation or both. Rawson and his group<sup>2</sup> similarly found that the capacity of these tumors to take up radioactive iodine was minimal.

The treatment of papillary adenocarcinoma consists of the use of both surgery and postoperative irradiation. It is important to emphasize that with this type of tumor the presence of cervical lymph node metastases is no contraindication for operation. The operation must include the total removal of the thyroid lobe harboring the primary neoplasm and the removal of the involved cervical nodes. Subtotal lobectomy may result in a recurrence of the malignant tumor in the remnant of thyroid tissue.<sup>24</sup> Where the tumor is present in both lobes of the thyroid total thyroidectomy would appear to be indicated unless the malignant focus in one lobe is so small as to permit the preservation of a small amount of thyroid tissue. There is a good deal of difference of opinion as to whether extensive cervical dissection should be resorted to in patients with papillary tumors with cervical node involvement. Limited dissection in which the visible in-

No instances of blood vessel invasion were found among the cases of colloid adenomata. Actually, less than 3 per cent of all adenomata show blood vessel invasion. Ten per cent of the group showing this histologic abnormality, however, subsequently developed definite clinical evidence of malignancy.<sup>4</sup> Benign tumors of the thyroid, therefore, which have invaded local blood vessels may subsequently become malignant.

Papillary Adenocarcinomas—These tumors are the least malignant and most common of all thyroid carcinomas. They tend to occur in the younger age groups and are frequent during the fourth and fifth decades of life. This is the tumor which is most often seen in young people with carcinoma of the thyroid. Of 23 patients twenty-one years of age or younger with thyroid malignancy reported by Frazell and Foote,<sup>20</sup> 20 had papillary adenocarcinomas. This type of tumor is approximately twice as common in females as in males.<sup>5, 6</sup> The papillary adenocarcinomas are generally small in size, varying from a few millimeters to 4 centimeters, but occasionally are considerably larger. A preexisting goiter is present in approximately three-quarters of the patients, according to the report of Frazell and Foote.

Cervical lymph node metastases are common with this tumor and indeed not infrequently the metastatic disease in the nodes may obscure the presence of a minute primary tumor in the thyroid lobe on the affected side. Since the primary thyroid tumor may be small and inconspicuous, it was believed for a long time that the thyroid tissue present in the lateral cervical regions arose from thyroid anlagen, and this hence was referred to as lateral aberrant thyroid tumors. There was a good deal of difference of opinion as to whether these cervical masses were actually malignant. During the course of the years, however, the malignant character of these masses became more generally appreciated. Iberts<sup>7</sup> originally suggested that these cervical tumors were metastatic, and Pemberton<sup>8</sup> and King and Pemberton<sup>9</sup> have emphasized that the lateral cervical tumors represent metastatic lymph nodes secondary to a primary carcinoma of the corresponding thyroid lobe. In a review of 61 such cases, these authors found that the tissue in the cervical regions was histologically indistinguishable from that of a frank papillary adenocarcinoma of the thyroid gland, and in every case in which information was available a papillary adenocarcinoma was present in the corresponding thyroid lobe. In many of their patients, lymph node architecture was still evident around the papillary areas. In general, the lateral neck masses were found at those sites where lymph nodes are normally present. In a review of 112 cases of papillary adenocarcinoma of the thyroid reported by Black,<sup>6</sup> the conclusions of King and Pemberton were thoroughly substantiated. In 44 of these cases the cervical lymph nodes were involved and in 16 patients of this group the lesions clinically were typical of lateral aberrant thyroid tumors. In every instance a primary tumor was found in the lobe of the thyroid on the affected side. Crile<sup>3</sup> found a primary tumor in the corresponding thyroid lobe in every one of 16 consecutive cases operated upon. Bilateral thyroid tumors were found in 4 instances.

It would seem, therefore, that lateral aberrant thyroid tumors represent metastatic lesions from a primary papillary adenocarcinoma of the thyroid.

isotope but the more differentiated the tumor and the more closely it resembles the normal thyroid follicular pattern the greater the likelihood of its concentrating radioactive iodine. According to Rawson and his group<sup>2</sup> despite the fact that these tumors may contain recognizable follicular structures their functional capacity does not approach that of normal thyroid tissue.

Solid Adenocarcinomas—The solid adenocarcinomas are the second most common form of thyroid cancer. These tumors are more malignant than the alveolar carcinomas. They occur in approximately equal proportion in males and females and the age incidence is somewhat similar to that of the alveolar carcinomas. Frazell and Foote<sup>1</sup> describe cases occurring in people varying in age from sixteen to seventy-six, the median age being forty-nine years. As with the other types of malignant tumors a preexisting goiter was present in most instances. The solid adenocarcinomas are large bulky tumors often involving more than one lobe. They are hard unencapsulated tumors with a tendency to infiltrate the surrounding tissue so that obstructive symptoms not uncommonly occur. Histologically they consist of clumps of cells without lumens and in general with little or no tendency to form follicular or papillary processes.<sup>20</sup> Local spread to regional lymph nodes and pulmonary and bone metastases occur.

The treatment consists of the complete surgical removal of the tumor tissue when possible followed by intensive x-ray treatment. According to Frazell and Foote<sup>1</sup> however irradiation does not particularly influence the course of this type of tumor. The ability of these tumors to take up radioactive iodine is dependent essentially on whether histologically they are predominantly solid or consist of ample alveolar follicular or papillary areas. In 8 cases of predominantly solid tumors only 1 was capable of concentrating the radioactive isotope while all 4 of the mixed variety showed positive radioautographs.<sup>20</sup> As with all types of thyroid neoplasms which take up radioactive iodine there is a great variability in the concentration of the isotope in different areas in the same tumor.

Hurthle cell Carcinoma—The Hurthle-cell adenocarcinoma is a tumor of moderate malignancy occurring mostly in middle age and predominantly in women. Frazell and Foote<sup>1</sup> report 1 instance in a patient twenty-one years of age and 2 instances have been reported in infants.<sup>21,22</sup> These tumors constitute about 10 per cent of the thyroid carcinomas. They are generally small well encapsulated and histologically are made up of cells containing abundant cytoplasm staining brightly pink with hematoxylin and eosin. The tumor may be made up of large polyhedral cells with acidophilic cytoplasm and of small polygonal cells.<sup>23</sup> The latter cells may form acini or may be diffusely infiltrating. These tumors pursue a prolonged clinical course grow slowly and metastasize late. Although they generally tend to metastasize locally distant spread to lungs and bone may occur. Of the 27 patients reported by Frazell and Foote<sup>1</sup> a third were alive and free of the disease after a five year follow up.

The treatment of the Hurthle-cell tumor is of the other thyroid malignant neoplasms consists of the complete surgical excision of all tumor tissue and the use of postoperative irradiation. Only infrequently do these involved nodes in the neck and mediastinum are removed is recommended by some<sup>3, 4</sup> while others suggest extensive cervical dissection with the removal of lymphatic tissue from the clavicle to the mastoid process.<sup>5, 11, 12</sup> The results obtained with x-ray therapy alone are unsatisfactory<sup>3-5</sup> but it has improved the prognosis when used postoperatively.<sup>6</sup> The recurrence of metastatic cervical nodes after operation calls for further surgical intervention with removal of the involved nodes.

The results obtained with use of radioactive iodine in the treatment of this tumor and its metastases are at present poor. Most thyroid papillary carcinomas fail to take up any radioactive iodine while the few that do concentrate the isotope in only minimal amounts. Radioactive iodine is a valuable agent in the treatment of the papillary metastases or of other thyroid carcinomatous metastases when the capacity of the metastatic lesions of the tumor for the uptake of the radioactive isotope is increased. This can be accomplished in two ways: (1) by the removal of competitive normal thyroid tissue by total surgical thyroidectomy or by irradiation of the thyroid; (2) by inducing hyperplasia of the thyroid tissue of the metastatic nodule by the use of thyrotropin or the goitrogens.

Alveolar and Follicular Adenocarcinoma.—Pure alveolar or follicular carcinomas are rare and occurred in approximately 7 per cent of the patients with thyroid carcinoma reported by Irazell and Looe.<sup>13</sup> Some are of alveolar or follicular structure, however, are seen in most thyroid tumors but these are constitute only a small part of the mass. The alveolar tumors usually occupy one lobe of the thyroid, are of moderate size and as a rule are well encapsulated. Their histologic structure is orderly and resembles normal thyroid tissue or adenomas so closely as often to be regarded as benign until distant metastases occur. It is for this reason that they have been referred to as benign metastasizing struma, a term which is a misnomer. The alveolar carcinomas involve the regional lymph nodes and may metastasize through the blood stream to the lungs and bones. The alveolar and follicular carcinomas are distinctly more malignant than are the papillary adenocarcinoma but still fall into the group of relatively moderate malignancy. Patient may live for many years after the onset of the disease and even after the development of bone metastases. About 30 per cent of the patient reported by Irazell and Looe<sup>13</sup> were alive and well five years after the first visit to their clinic. Of 45 cases reported by McDermott and his group<sup>14</sup> 71 per cent survived five years, 48 per cent ten years, and 24 per cent twenty years or more. This type of tumor occurs only slightly more frequently in females and in a somewhat older age group than is the case with the papillary carcinomas. However the alveolar carcinomas do occur in very young people as well as in very old ones. A preexisting goiter is common.

The treatment of this type of tumor consists of the complete excision of the tumor tissue before distant metastases occur followed by roentgen therapy. Where postoperative irradiation is used Lawson<sup>15</sup> advises that it be given in doses of 4000 to 6000 roentgen. The alveolar and follicular carcinomas of all thyroid cancers are most likely to take up radioactive iodine. Of 39 such cases studied by Fitzgerald and Looe<sup>16, 17</sup> (or 74 per cent) showed evidence of concentration of the radioactive isotope in the tumor tissue. The alveolar are as a rule do not tend to concentrate the

The neoplastic cells invade veins and venules, muscle, fat and fibrous tissue adjoining the thyroid sections. Struma lymphomatosa is distinguished from sarcoma in that the lymphatic cell infiltration in the former is limited by bands of connective tissue separating the thyroid plates and lymph nodules are usually prominent and well formed. In addition in struma lymphomatosa the typical cell is partly of the plasma cell type and oxyphilic follicles are distributed through the infiltrate. Finally infiltration of structures adjoining the thyroid gland does not occur.

The Use of Radioactive Iodine in the Treatment of Metastases from Carcinoma of the Thyroid—In 1942 Heston and his coworkers<sup>38</sup> reported the selective concentration of radioactive iodine in a metastatic lesion secondary to thyroid carcinoma. This was the first time that concentration of the isotope was demonstrated in thyroid tumor tissue but no definite treatment was undertaken. In 1946 Seidlin, Marinelli and O'Bray<sup>40</sup> reported the first case of carcinoma of the thyroid with metastases that was treated with radioactive iodine. The metastatic lesions collected the isotope and a considerable degree of clinical improvement followed. It promptly became evident that most metastatic lesions unfortunately failed to concentrate radioactive iodine. Thus of 25 patients with carcinoma of the thyroid with metastases reported by Trunnell and his coworkers<sup>41</sup> only 1 had metastatic tumor tissue which could take up enough radioactive iodine to justify some enthusiasm for its therapeutic use. At the Mount Sinai Hospital of 71 patients studied by Yohalem, Leitelberg and their group<sup>42</sup> 16 could concentrate the isotope either in the metastases or in the thyroid carcinoma. By far and large this is the general experience unless specific methods are employed to stimulate the metastatic tissue to greater functional capacity for the radioactive isotope.

Seidlin and his coworkers<sup>40</sup> and independently but somewhat later Rawson and his group<sup>44</sup> demonstrated that the complete surgical removal of the thyroid gland or its destruction with x ray or radioactive iodine resulted in an increase in the uptake of the isotope by previously poorly functioning metastatic cancer. In addition metastatic tissue which prior to treatment could take up no radioactive iodine was now capable of concentrating the isotope. The surgical removal of the thyroid gland or its destruction was carried out in 23 patients with carcinoma of the thyroid with metastases by Trunnell and his group<sup>41</sup>. One or more metastases in 12 of these patients were subsequently observed to concentrate more radioactive iodine than before removal of the gland. Of 10 patients similarly treated Yohalem, Leitelberg and their coworkers<sup>42</sup> found that 2 could now take up the radioactive isotope where none could be collected before. This method therefore represents an important advance in the treatment of thyroid carcinoma with metastases with radioactive iodine. Seidlin and his group<sup>40</sup> regard thyroidectomy as a basic step in the treatment of this disease. This may be accomplished either by the surgical removal of the gland or by the use of x ray therapy or with radioactive iodine ( $I_{131}$ ). Attempts were made to further increase the uptake of radioactive iodine by treatment with thyroid stimulating hormone of the adenohypophysis<sup>43, 45</sup> and by the use of goitrogenic agents<sup>46</sup>. The injection of 30 mgm daily of the thyroid stimulating hormone (TSH) for five or more days to tumors take up radioactive iodine, and then only in the alveolar areas and only in minimal amounts<sup>30</sup>

Giant Cell Tumors—The giant cell carcinoma is an very malignant tumor which constitute about 13 per cent of the thyroid carcinomas. They occur in the older age group and the median age of the series reported by Razall and Looe<sup>25</sup> was sixty-one years. The tumors are large and bulky, are highly infiltrative, extend locally in the neck and often produce obstruction of the trachea and esophagus. Histologically the tumor consists of anaplastic thyroid tissue growing in the form of giant cells.

The clinical course is usually rapidly downhill and death generally results from obstructive manifestations rather than from metastases. By the time these patients are seen, the disease is usually inoperable and their response to x-ray therapy is negligible. Six patients studied by Litzgerald and Looe<sup>30</sup> failed to concentrate any radioactive iodine.

The small cell carcinoma is an equally highly malignant tumor occurring as a rule in patients beyond the age of fifty years. This tumor like the giant cell carcinoma is very invasive and unresponsive to the available forms of therapy. However instances of five or more years survival of giant and small cell carcinoma have been reported where the disease was recognized early and the tumor resectable.<sup>6</sup>

Epidermoid carcinoma of the thyroid is probably derived from remnants of the thyroglossal duct and is made up of squamous epithelium.<sup>11</sup> This highly malignant tumor is fortunately rare but when it occurs it is invasive metastasizes extensively and is almost impossible to eradicate surgically.<sup>11</sup>

Lymphosarcoma of the thyroid is a very rare disease. Of 15 000 patients subjected to thyroid surgery at the Crile clinic between the years 1924 and 1945 only 8 instances of lymphosarcoma were encountered.<sup>36</sup> This disease occurs predominantly in women and in the middle-aged group. There is generally a history of recent rapid enlargement of the thyroid and only infrequently has a goiter been present for any considerable period of time. Difficulty in breathing, dysphagia and particularly unilateral vocal cord paralysis are quite common. The tumor is highly malignant, grows rapidly and is locally very invasive. These tumors are usually not surgically curable and although they are very sensitive to irradiation good results are rarely obtained.<sup>36</sup> Death usually occurs within a year after the onset of the disease.

The pathologic picture of lymphosarcoma of the thyroid may be confused with small cell carcinoma and indeed most thyroid sarcomas probably are anaplastic carcinomas.<sup>37, 38</sup> Occasionally lymphosarcoma may be confused with struma lymphomatosa. The pathologic description of the cases reported by Dinsmore, Dempsey and Hazard<sup>36</sup> is as follows. The thyroid is extensively invaded in lymphosarcoma and the tumor is firm and tough in consistency. The cut surface is usually pale gray, yellowish gray or white in color with occasional brownish or purplish patches. On microscopic examination, it is seen that the neoplastic tissue tends to almost completely replace normal thyroid parenchyma. The cells for the most part seem like small lymphocytes except for some irregularity of the dark staining nuclei. In addition there are areas of lymphoblasts and there are no reticulum fibers surrounding individual tumor cells or cell groups.

time as the metastatic tissue no longer takes up any of the radioactive isotope.

Hazards of Treatment with Radioactive Iodine The use of radioactive iodine in the larger doses necessary for the treatment of carcinomatous metastases is sometimes followed by certain toxic manifestations which may be serious. Trunnell and his coworkers<sup>41</sup> observed some degree of depression of hematopoiesis in all their patients treated intensively. The earliest change usually encountered is a decrease in the absolute number of circulating lymphocytes. Later there may occur a thrombopenia and a reduction in hemoglobin and the red blood cell count. Bone marrow aspirations have been reported to show a decrease in the total cell count, a relative increase in erythroid activity, and a decrease in myeloid elements.<sup>41</sup>

Amenorrhea with hot flashes is occasionally induced by the administration of large doses of radioactive iodine. This complication occurred in 3 of Trunnell's patients.<sup>41</sup> In 2 of these patients the urinary gonadotropin excretion remained within the normal range. This would suggest that the amenorrhea was the result of the direct effect of the radiation on the ovary rather than on the adenohypophysis. Three patients developed clinical signs and symptoms of hyperthyroidism within two weeks after the radioactive iodine was administered. In all 3 the diagnosis was further confirmed by an elevation of the serum protein bound iodine.<sup>41</sup> The authors attribute this complication to the destruction of thyroid tissue with release of thyroid hormone.

Endemic and Sporadic Colloid Goiter

By endemic goiter we refer to the enlargement of the thyroid gland commonly found among the inhabitants of certain specific regions of the globe. Sporadic goiter has reference to histologically and clinically similar condition but occurring in isolated individuals anywhere. The term colloid goiter is really a pathologic description and refers only to one aspect in the pathologic development of the disease. The colloid goiter common during the adolescent period of life particularly in females is a similar process although of a much milder degree. This occurs when the physiologic demands are greater than the thyroid gland can cope with under given environmental iodine conditions. Long ago Murrie emphasized that iodine want induces thyroid hyperplasia and that the administration of iodine to such individuals will result in involution of the hyperplastic gland.

During the course of the past century a good deal of evidence has accumulated to indicate the close relationship which exists between endemic goiter and the iodine lack in those areas. The regions of endemic goiter include the Himalayan plateau of Asia, the Alps, Pyrenees, and the Carpathian mountain regions of Europe, the Andean plateau of South America, and the St. Lawrence Great Lakes and Rocky Mountain regions of North America. In these areas where goiter is so common the soil, water, and vegetation are relatively poor in iodine.<sup>42</sup> Goiter was apparently not present in England prior to the eighteenth century<sup>43</sup> but the southwest corner has since become goitrous.<sup>44</sup> The most goitrous parts of the United several totally thyroidectomized patients and to one before thyroidectomy resulted in a considerable increase in the avidity of the metastatic lesion for radioactive iodine <sup>131</sup>I. Similarly in 7 of 10 thyroidectomized patients there occurred an increase in the uptake of the isotope following the prolonged use of thiouracil or propylthiouracil <sup>14</sup>.

The beneficial effects which follow surgical or irradiation thyroidectomy are theoretically dependent on two factors. By eliminating normal thyroid tissue an important source of competition for available radioactive iodine is thus removed. And secondly the increased production of thyroid stimulating hormone which follows the removal or destruction of the thyroid increases the functional capacity of metastatic thyroid tissue to concentrate radioactive iodine. Thus similarly the injection of thyroid stimulating hormone or the oral ingestion of the goitrogens induces hyperplasia of thyroid tissue increasing its ability to take up the isotope.

FIG. 97.—Colloid goiter. The acini vary much in size, some being widely dilated. The colloid is abundant and stains deeply. The epithelium is flattened.  $\times 75$ . (Boy's Textbook of Pathology.)

The treatment of carcinomatous thyroid metastases with radioactive iodine includes the following measures. Tracer studies with radioactive iodine are conducted to determine whether the metastatic area takes up ample amounts of isotope. In the event that the uptake is minimal the patient is subjected to one or more of the procedures described above in an effort to increase the concentration. The patient is then given <sup>131</sup>I orally. The total dosage generally required for destruction of the metastatic lesions may vary from as little as 100 to as much as 1000 millicuries. Approximately 100 millicuries are administered every six to eight weeks until such dern areas are capable of producing thyroid enlargement. Since the various goitrogenic agents are present in foods which are common articles of diet it is conceivable that in communities where such food is eaten in abundance goiter may result in the presence of a normal iodine content of both food and water.

Sporadic goiter is 5 or 6 times as common in females as in males. The ratio of females to males in endemic goiter becomes progressively less as the concentration of goiter in a particular region becomes greater. This is due not to the less frequent involvement of females in these areas but to the increasing number of males who are afflicted as more and more members of the community develop the disease. The peak of incidence occurs at an earlier age in boys than in girls. In general the peak for boys is reached between the ages of eleven and fourteen and for girls between fourteen and seventeen.<sup>49</sup>

The clinical picture of endemic goiter is dependent essentially on the severity and age of the endemic areas. Certain regions in Switzerland for example have been severely goitrous for many generations with continuous inbreeding of the population. The clinical picture encountered in such areas differs in degree from that observed in any of the goitrous regions in this country. In the milder endemic regions a swelling at the base of the neck becomes evident in some portion of the population long before puberty and as the age of puberty approaches more and more members of the population are afflicted and the goiters become progressively larger. After puberty the colloid goiters in boys may become smaller and even disappear. In girls the goiter may increase in size to the age of seventeen or eighteen and may either increase or decrease in size thereafter but few if any will disappear.<sup>50</sup> The basal metabolic rate may be slightly reduced but otherwise there are no significant clinical manifestations. The gland which is generally soft and free from thrills or bruits will increase somewhat in size during pregnancy but will otherwise exercise no effect on gestation. The offspring in the mild endemic areas such as exist in the United States at present is non-cretinous. In the severe endemic areas the children are involved at an earlier age, the goiters are much larger, and the incidence of endemic cretinism and adults with severe hypothyroidism becomes progressively greater. Endemic congenital cretinism is the result of several generations of endemic goiter.

The goiters are generally soft and smooth early in life but as the individuals grow older and approach middle age the gland becomes irregular, lumpy, and nodular. The irregularity may be due to localized areas of involution with the formation of colloid nodules which are often encapsulated. Cysts containing sometimes a clear and rather thin fluid and in others evidence of recent or old hemorrhage may be present and produce nodular irregularities. As described elsewhere in this book, these nodular goiters may become hyperplastic with the development of clinical hyperthyroidism and finally malignant neoplastic changes may take place.

In studies conducted on euthyroid patients with endemic goiter in Mendoza, Argentina the thyroid gland showed a marked increase in the uptake of radioactive iodine often exceeding 60 per cent in forty-eight hours.<sup>51</sup> Similar results were found in an area of endemic goiter in the States are the northwestern block of states together with Michigan Wisconsin and Colorado. The least goitrous include New England New Jersey Maryland and the southern states from the Atlantic Coast along the Gulf including Texas and New Mexico.<sup>49</sup> According to Olsen<sup>50, 51</sup> the over-all incidence of goiter in the endemic regions of the United States may be 10 to 30 times as great as that in the non goitrous areas. In the former, 10 to 27 per 1000 of population have enlarged palpable thyroids of varying degrees in contrast to less than 1 per 1000 of population in the eastern states. There is of course a good deal of difference in the incidence of endemic goiter in the various endemic areas and even in different communities within the same area. In general however goiter is considerably more common in the goitrous regions of the Alps and Himalayas than in the most goitrous belt in the United States or England.

Greenwald<sup>47</sup> denies the existence of any relationship between endemic goiter and iodine lack. In a detailed study and analysis of available data previously reported by various investigators he has emphasized the several points: (1) There is no decrease in the absolute iodine content of the goitrous thyroid glands. Indeed the larger glands according to Greenwald tend to contain more iodine. (2) Although goiters have been produced in rats on certain iodine poor diets the addition of small quantities of iodine comparable to that found in ordinary diets will not prevent nor lessen the thyroid enlargement. The administration of large quantities of iodine however will result in glands of normal microscopic appearance and size. (3) The prophylactic administration of iodine to humans has not reduced the incidence of new goiter to zero and in some cases has had no effect or even increased the frequency. (4) Persons with goiter in this country do not show the usual signs of thyroid insufficiency. (5) The evidence that there is a deficiency in the iodine intake in goitrous regions is faulty in that neither the analytic techniques nor the collection of food water and excreta were well controlled. (6) In various regions of the world endemic colloid goiter suddenly appears and just as suddenly disappears.<sup>52</sup> (7) On the basis of his studies this investigator concludes that goiter is an infectious disease which bears no relationship to iodine lack.<sup>53</sup>

Most careful investigators however and the extensive studies available favor the role of iodine lack in the pathogenesis of endemic goiter although other factors unquestionably are of importance.<sup>50, 54</sup> The factors most commonly considered are infection pollution of water supply the calcium content of water and food which may function as a goitrogen<sup>55</sup> and the presence of other goitrogens in food and medicines. The goitrogens are of course capable of producing enlargement of the thyroid gland and such agents are present in many vegetables. Chesney Clouston and Webster<sup>56</sup> demonstrated the goitrogenic action of cabbage and it was subsequently shown that goitrogenic properties of cabbage are seasonal being present in fall and winter cabbage and absent in the spring and summer variety.<sup>56-58</sup> Similar goitrogenic properties are attributed to related vegetables such as Brussels sprouts and cauliflower. Kennedy and Purves<sup>57</sup> have demonstrated goitrogenic properties in rape seed and Sharpless Pearsons and Prato<sup>58</sup> showed that soy beans are occasionally goitrogenic. Finally certain medicaments such as potassium thiocyanate<sup>59</sup> and now the thionea

Illustrative Case of Amyloid Gout

A twenty-seven year old man was admitted to the Mount Sinai Hospital in 1947 with a thirteen year history of recurrent episodes of rheumatoid arthritis. For six months prior to admission he had noted a swelling over the lower anterior region of the neck. He had been hospitalized elsewhere where a diagnosis of amyloid disease of the thyroid was established.

The physical examination revealed a chronically ill appearing man with a slight lag of the right eye. The sublingual and submandibular glands were increased in size. The thyroid was markedly and diffusely enlarged, firm and smooth. There was no thrill palpable nor any bruit audible over the gland. The spleen was readily felt but the liver was not palpable. There were spindle-shaped swellings of the phalangeal joints and atrophy of the muscles of the shoulder girdle and hands. In addition there was limitation of motion of the right knee and hip. The urinalysis revealed a considerable albuminuria with occasional hyaline and granular casts and 8 to 10 red blood cells per high power field. The specific gravity of the urine was fixed at 1010. The blood hemoglobin was 12 grams per cent and the red blood cell count was 4.16 million per cubic millimeter. The sedimentation rate (Westergren) was accelerated being 123 mm per hour. The blood urea nitrogen was 16 mgm per cent. The basal metabolic rate was  $-37$  per cent. The congo red test demonstrated 100 per cent retention.

Three months following his discharge from the hospital he was again admitted because of nervousness, insomnia, a weight loss of 15 pounds and cardiac palpitation.

The physical examination at this time revealed a marked stare in addition to the findings previously observed. The heart rate was rapid and a fine tremor of the outstretched hand was apparent. The hemoglobin was now 9 grams per cent and the red blood cell count was 3.0 million per cubic millimeter. The circulation time (arm to tongue) was seven seconds. The blood urea nitrogen was increased to 30 mgm per cent. The basal metabolic rate ranged from  $+46$  to  $+62$  per cent. The twenty-four hour urinary excretion of a tracer dose of I<sub>131</sub> was only 2 per cent. The serum protein bound iodine was 24 micrograms per cent.

The diagnosis of hyperthyroidism was established and he was treated with a therapeutic dose of 11.25 millicuries of I<sub>131</sub> followed by the administration of Lugol's solution. When the basal metabolic rate had returned to normal levels he was subjected to subtotal thyroidectomy because of the tremendous size of the gland. The pathologic report of the specimen was as follows: Thyroid showing diffuse amyloid infiltration with glandular parenchyma showing evidence of recent and preceding hyperplasia. Amyloid in vessels and in basement membrane of the sebaceous glands of the skin. Postoperatively the basal metabolic rate fell to  $-1$  per cent. He was discharged for further observation.

Thyroglossal Duct Cysts—Thyroglossal cysts may result from the persistence of the thyroglossal duct. The first manifestations of such a disorder are usually observed in infancy or childhood although rarely they first become apparent in adult life. The cyst is located in the midline anywhere along the part of the normal embryologic course of thyroid migration. It may drain internally through an opening at the foramen cecum but external drainage occurs only if the cyst becomes infected and ruptures or is incised surgically. When this occurs intermittent drainage from a permanent sinus results. The external sinus opening usually is located between the hyoid bone and the thyroid isthmus and the sinus tract may be palpated as a cord from the external opening to the level of the hyoid. Other cystic structures such as branchial cysts, must be differentiated

Venezuelan Andes<sup>60</sup> It should be noted that these values fall into ordinarily accepted hyperthyroid range although these patients did not have hyperthyroidism. This increase in the avidity for radioactive iodine was attributed by the investigators to the iodine deficiency of the gland.<sup>60</sup>

Treatment of Endemic and Sporadic Goiter — The treatment of the individual with goiter consists of the administration of iodine and more important of thyroid extract. The former may be given in amounts of 1 to 3 mgm. of potassium iodide per week and the latter in a dosage of 10 to 30 grains of thyroid extract daily. During the early stages of goiter when the gland is still hyperplastic the administration of iodine may result in considerable improvement. With the development of the hyperplastic or colloid stage iodine exercises relatively little effect.<sup>61</sup> It is of some interest that Stenbury and his group<sup>62</sup> found that the administration of iodine failed to decrease the uptake of radioactive iodine in patients with endemic goiter while administration of thyroid extract was quite effective in this respect. Thyroid extract particularly in the presence of a low basal metabolic rate will frequently induce a decrease in the size of the gland. Both agents should particularly be administered to pregnant women with goiter. Surgical removal of the goiter is indicated when the gland is unduly enlarged when it produces pressure symptoms or when it suddenly increases in size.

The prevention of goiter according to Kaubull<sup>63</sup> is best carried out by the use of iodized salt and he recommends a concentration of 0.01 per cent or 1 part of sodium iodide to 10,000 parts of salt. Actually the iodized salt in this country is so standardized that twice this recommended amount of iodine is present the concentration of sodium iodide being 0.02 and that of potassium iodide 0.023 per cent. This will yield a daily iodine intake to the average salt consumer of slightly more than 1 mg. a day. Such amounts are considerably in excess of the daily iodine requirement. According to Effenberger<sup>64</sup> the daily iodine requirement is somewhere between 1 and 2 gmm. per kilogram of body weight roughly 0.075 to 0.1 mg. The question of whether the administration of excessive amounts of iodine to individuals with iodine deficient goiters is capable of producing thyrotoxicosis or Jod basedow is discussed in some detail elsewhere. In any event this complication apparently so common on the continent is rare here.

Amyloidosis of the Thyroid Gland (Amyloid Goiter)

In 1942 Walker<sup>65</sup> collected 56 cases of amyloid goiter from the literature and added 2 of his own. He found that amyloid goiter was almost invariably associated with generalized amyloidosis and most frequently secondary to a chronic disease. Amyloid of the thyroid alone was reported in only 2 instances. Pathologic studies reveal that the amyloid is associated with a striking infiltration of the gland with fatty tissue. The gland becomes enlarged and firm and at times may be clinically confused with carcinoma. Although the amyloid infiltration may be marked thyroid insufficiency as a rule does not occur. More recently Means<sup>66, 67</sup> has encountered 2 cases one of which we have had the opportunity to study.

The blood urea nitrogen was 16 mgm per cent. The basal metabolic rate was -17 per cent. The congo red test demonstrated 100 per cent retention.

Three months following his discharge from the hospital he was readmitted because of nervousness, insomnia, a weight loss of 15 pounds and cardiac palpitation.

The physical examination at this time revealed a marked stare in addition to the findings previously observed. The heart rate was rapid and a fine tremor of the outstretched hand was apparent. The hemoglobin was now 11 grams per cent and the red blood cell count was 3.0 million per cubic millimeter. The circulation time (arm to tongue) was seven seconds. The blood urea nitrogen was increased to 50 mgm per cent. The basal metabolic rate ranged from +46 to +62 per cent. The twenty four hour urinary excretion of a tracer dose of  $I_{131}$  was only 2 per cent. The serum protein bound iodine was 24 micrograms per cent.

The diagnosis of hyperthyroidism was established and he was treated with a therapeutic dose of 11.25 millicurie of  $I_{131}$  followed by the administration of Lugol's solution. Other cystic structures such as branchial cysts must be differentiated from thyroglossal duct cysts. The former do not occupy a midline position.

The treatment of a thyroglossal cyst consists of the surgical excision of the entire sinus tract and cyst. Inadequate removal will invariably be followed by recurrence.

Section V The Thymus and Parathyroids

Chapter 28

THE THYMUS

THE thymus consists of two lateral lobes placed in apposition along the mid line of the anterior mediastinum and extends normally from the fourth costal cartilage as high as the lower border of the thyroid gland. It is covered anteriorly by the sternum and the origin of the sterno-hyoid and sterno-thyroid muscles. In the neck it lies on the front and sides of the trachea while below it rests on the pericardium. It is separated from the aortic arch and great vessels by a layer of fascia. The thymus is pink gray in color. Its two lobes may be fused or separated by an intermediate lobe. It is about 5 cm. in length, 4 cm. in breadth and about 6 mm. in thickness. The size and weight of the thymus vary with age.<sup>1, 6</sup>

Weight in grams

At birth	10-20 —
Early childhood	20-30
At puberty	0-40
In young adults	20- 0
In adults	10-20
In the male	5-10

It is thus apparent that the gland reaches its maximum size at puberty and thereafter shrinks.

The entire gland is invested by a connective tissue capsule. The numerous lobules of each lobe are held together by delicate areolar tissue and each primary lobule consists of numerous irregular small nodules or follicles. The lobules vary in size from that of a pin head to that of a pea whereas the follicles are 1 to 2 mm. in diameter. These latter consist of a cortical and medullary portion. In the cortical substance are densely-packed masses of small cells called thymocytes which are morphologically identical with small lymphocytes. The average diameter of these cells is about 6- $\mu$ . The nucleus which consists of 5 to 6 heavy chromatin particles is dark and fills almost the entire cell. The cytoplasm however is scant. In addition to these small cells there are also some larger cells that are histologically identical with medium and large lymphocytes. Scattered among the round cells are elongated reticular cells the cytoplasm of which is difficult to delineate. There are a few chromatin particles and 1 to 2 nucleoli enclosed within the smooth membrane surrounding the pale round nuclei of these cells. Although there is no sharp demarcation between the zones of the thymus the thymocytes disappear rather abruptly as one proceeds from cortex to medulla. The medulla consists principally of reticular cells the lymphocytes being much fewer in number. In addition in the medulla there are rounded acidophilic structures varying from 30 to 100 micra in diameter which are called Hassall's bodies. They consist of concentrically arranged cells the outermost of which are connected with the reticular cells. In the centers of these bodies evidences of degeneration and hyalinization and even small cysts may be observed. At times calcium may be deposited in these areas. This inner medullary region is more vascular than in the cortex and some connective tissue cells are seen around the vessels. Occasionally myelocytes and plasma cells may be seen but germinal follicles are rare. The reticular cells are epithelial in origin, being derived from an entodermal anlage. These cells are often difficult to distinguish histologically from connective tissue cells. However if the lymphocytes are destroyed by x ray their structure becomes more evident. Further proof of their epithelial origin is afforded by tissue culture studies. The thymic reticular cells differ from reticular cells elsewhere in that they do not collect intravital dyes although under certain circumstances they may store iron and lipid and may contain dead lymphocytes. Reticular fibers are relatively scarce being located chiefly about the blood vessels where there are also some mesodermal reticular cells.

The identity of lymphocytes and thymocytes is accepted by most investigators. This is based not only on their morphologic similarities but also on the equal susceptibility of both to x ray to cytotoxicity by sera obtained by the injection of thymus cells into rats and the ability of both to transform into macrophages. The mitochondria are similar in both types of cells. In tissue culture it can be demonstrated that the small round cells are not derived from the reticular cells. The fact that the thymocytes can be transformed into plasma cells and eosinophilic myelocytes would seem to prove the hematic and mesenchymal origin of these cells.

The arterial supply of the thymus is derived from the internal mammary and the superior and inferior thyroid vessels. These arteries are first distributed to the cortex. Return drainage of blood from the thymus is effected by large vessels which arise in the medulla and empty into the thoracic and left innominate veins. The lymphatics course chiefly in the interlobular connective tissue and drain into the anterior mediastinal sternal and tracheo bronchial lymph nodes. The nerve supply which is probably chiefly of a vasomotor nature is derived from the vagus and the sympathetic nervous system. These branches which are derived from the descendens hypoglossi and phrenic nerves reach the capsule but do not penetrate into the substance of the gland.

The thymus begins its development during the sixth week of fetal life (10 mm) as a pair of solid buds from the ventro lateral walls of the third pharyngeal pouches which fuse during the third month. At times the fourth pouches also give way to some thymic tissue. The lumen of the proliferating bud soon disappears and the epithelial prouts invade the surrounding mesenchyme. The lobules arise from the branching of these epithelial strands. The thymocytes are derived from the inwandering of lymphoid cells which originate in part from the perivascular mesenchymal cells. With the growth of the gland, the lymphocytic cells continue to enter the organ and to proliferate within the thymus. The epithelium is converted into a reticular mesh filled with lymphoid cells and penetrated by blood vessels. The medulla arises by a proliferation of the epithelial mass in the deeper portion of the lobules. At the same time the lymphocytes in these are degenerate or migrate. Later Hassall's bodies are derived from the reticular cells by processes which as yet have not been completely clarified.

The physiologic functions of the thymus are unknown. The thymus as has been mentioned increases in size to the age of puberty and then regresses. The cortex begins to involute at about the age of two to four years, the medulla at puberty. During the earliest phases of involution the lymphoid cells in the cortex begin to thin out and adipose tissue begins to replace the compressed reticular cells. In the medulla the last elements to be replaced are the Hassall's bodies. Although involution is a physiologic phenomenon it may be hastened or delayed by several factors. The administration of corticotropin or various adrenal corticoids to the intact rat will produce a marked reduction in the size and weight of the gland. Estrogen and to a lesser degree androgens whether administered exogenously or as the result of stimulation of the gonads by gonadotropin will also result in atrophy of the thymus. These observations probably account for the reduction in size of the thymus that begins at puberty. In contrast castration will prevent this involution. The adrenal mechanism explains a wide variety of factors that cause shrinkage of the thymus. Starvation, toxins, morphine etc. are all types of stress that provoke the liberation of corticotropin and of the adrenal cortical steroids. It thus becomes apparent that hypophysectomy or adrenalectomy will prevent the decrease in thymic size that follows stress. In such animal preparations the thymus is usually large. If in addition gonadectomy has been performed the thymus will be found to be maximum in size. Growth hormone has a direct stimulating effect on thymic size even in the hypophysectomized animal. On the other hand, pyridoxine deficient diet and such agents as nitrogen mustards or sodium cacodylate cause a direct toxic destruction of the thymus. Removal of the thymus is apparently without observable effect in the experimental animal. No definite evidence is available that there is any thymic hormone although it is possible that the breakdown products of the thymus resulting from adrenocortical activity may play some physiologic role. Rowntree and his associates reported that the administration of thymic extracts to successive generations of rats resulted in marked acceleration of somatic growth and precocious sexual development in each succeeding generation. However this work has failed of confirmation.

It has been claimed that the thymus may play a role in calcium metabolism and in regulation of skeletal growth since thymectomy may be followed by defective mineralization of bone as well as dwarfism.<sup>14</sup> Guderhatch<sup>15</sup> reported that the feeding of thymus tissue to tadpoles stimulated their growth but inhibited metamorphosis. In pullets and chickens following thymectomy eggs are reported to be laid with uncalcified shells.<sup>12</sup> Asker and his associates have claimed that thymic extracts contain a growth promoting principle that stimulates the sex organs. However these claims as well as those of Bomskov on the effects of the thymus on carbohydrate metabolism have not been confirmed<sup>11, 12</sup>

It is apparent from this discussion that there are at present no demonstrable endocrine disorders of the thymus. This gland, however, is affected in certain of the diseases of the other endocrine glands and by some of the adaptative mechanisms of the organism. Infections, trauma and other stresses will result in a decrease in size of the thymus secondary to the elaboration of adrenocortical frictions. This was demonstrated by Selye<sup>13</sup> and by White and Dougherty<sup>12</sup> in the experimental animal and by Soffer, Gabrilove and their coworkers in man.<sup>10, 15</sup> The latter investigators induced marked reduction in the size of a thymic tumor in a patient with myasthenia gravis following the administering of corticotropin. In adrenal insufficiency and in hyperthyroidism the thymus is frequently enlarged. Thymic enlargement is also encountered in acromegaly, hypogonadism and myasthenia gravis. Ordinarily this hyperplasia or persistence of a non-involuting thymus is asymptomatic but may occasionally produce signs of tracheal compression.

The concept of status thymo-lymphaticus has been the subject of a good deal of controversy.<sup>16</sup> The sudden deaths attributed to this condition are associated at postmortem examination with an enlarged thymus, lymphoid hyperplasia, hypoplasia of the aorta, decrease in the size of the adrenal glands and underdevelopment of the gonads. The report of Turnbull and Young<sup>16</sup> is interesting in relationship to these findings in that similar pathologic observations were encountered in individuals dying suddenly of trauma at any age. The conclusions arrived at by the Commission investigating this problem<sup>16</sup> was to the effect that the enlarged thymus played no specific role in sudden deaths.

Apart from the specific adaptative and physiologic involution of the thymus aplasia or hypoplasia is rare. Inflammatory disease of the thymus is uncommon but may occur in the course of sepsis. Dubious abscess is in reality a cyst of the thymus due to persistent embryonic duct. Tumors of the thymus are uncommon. The usual types are lymphosarcoma derived from the lymphoid elements, benign thymoma and thymic carcinoma. Actually, it is questionable as to whether most instances of so-called lymphosarcoma of the thymus are really lymphatic in origin. Many are probably instances of anaplastic carcinoma. Other less important tumors include dermoid cysts, spindle-cell sarcoma, lipoma, myxoma, fibroma and leiomyosarcoma. The important symptoms of thymic tumors are chiefly those due to pressure on adjacent structures, such as tracheal compression and venous obstruction. As mentioned elsewhere in this text instances of Cushing's syndrome have been reported in the presence of primary thymic carcinomas associated with bilateral adrenal cortical hyperplasia. Myasthenia gravis is frequently associated with thymic hyperplasia or tumor.<sup>17</sup> Castleman and Norris<sup>18</sup> have reviewed this problem and found thymomas present in almost 25 per cent of 330 cases of myasthenia gravis collected from the literature. Other observers have found an incidence of only 10 to 15 per cent. Thymomas in association with myasthenia gravis are more common in the age group between thirty and sixty and in males. Castleman and Norris<sup>18</sup> believe that the thymomas associated with myasthemia gravis are benign in over 90 per cent. In the remaining 10 per cent although local spread or implantation may occur the histology is that of a benign growth. The tumors are almost invariably encapsulated and may consist chiefly of epithelial or lymphoid elements or a mixture of both. Hassall's corpuscles are rarely observed in these tumors. The histology of the thymus in most patients with myasthenia gravis unassociated with tumor is characterized by the presence of large numbers of germinal centers in the medulla. It has been suggested that in the absence of tumor the thymus is frequently hyperplastic. More recent pathological studies however indicate that in most of the instances the thymus is perhaps no larger than is normally encountered at the various age groups.<sup>8</sup> Nevertheless the surgical removal of non neoplastic thymic tissue was followed by improvement in the symptoms of myasthenia gravis in one-half the patients<sup>9</sup> although other observers have found the results to be considerably less encouraging with the possible exception of the group consisting of females under the age of thirty in whom the disease has been present for a comparatively short time.<sup>10</sup>

Our group<sup>10</sup> reported shrinkage of a thymic tumor following the parenteral administration of ACTH. This was associated with considerable improvement in the symptoms of myasthenia gravis. The symptoms recurred and the thymic mass returned to its original size sometime after cessation of therapy. Lorda and Wolff<sup>11</sup> have reported improvement in patients with myasthenia gravis without tumor following treatment with ACTH. Other investigators have similarly reported varying degrees of improvement following the administration of corticotropin.<sup>12</sup>

ANATOMY, PHYSIOLOGY AND DISEASES OF THE PARATHYROIDS

HYPOPARATHYROIDISM PRIMARY HYPERPARATHYROIDISM (VON RECKLING HAUSEN'S DISEASE OF BONE) SECONDARY HYPERPARATHYROIDISM

The Gross Anatomy and Embryology of the Parathyroid Glands—The parathyroid glands are small yellowish brown oval bodies that are found in intimate contact with the inner posterior surface of the lateral lobes of the thyroid gland. Each one is enclosed within its own connective tissue sheath and lies within the capsule rather than in the substance of the thyroid. Four parathyroid glands are usually present as Gilmour<sup>1</sup> observed in almost 90 per cent of 428 human dissections. He did find however that the number may vary from 2 to 6. Each parathyroid body is approximately 6 to 8 mm in length 3 to 4 mm in width and 1 to 2 mm in thickness. According to Pappenheimer and Wilens<sup>2</sup> the total average weight of these glands may vary from 67 to 200 mgm. but greater total weights have been encountered in normal individuals.

The parathyroids are divided into superior and inferior groups each consisting of 2 glands. The former are ordinarily encountered at the level of the lower border of the cricoid cartilage behind the junction of the pharynx and esophagus. The inferior set is usually found near the lower edges of the lateral lobes of the thyroid or in relation to the inferior thyroid veins. Embryologically these structures are derived from outpocketings of the third and fourth branchial pouches on each side. They then migrate with the thyroidal anlage. The derivatives of the third pouch travel farther caudad than do those of the fourth and as a consequence form the inferior parathyroids. During fetal life these latter structures are often in close relationship to the thymus and as a result may at times be found within the thymus or in the mediastinal thoracic cavity. It is for this reason that no exploratory procedure for a parathyroid tumor is complete unless the superior mediastinum is carefully searched.

The blood supply of the parathyroid glands is derived from branches of the superior and inferior thyroid arteries. The main vessel supplying each gland enters at the hilus and then forms branches that course along the connective tissue septa. These arteries then empty into the sinusoidal vessels found in intimate contact with the cords of the epithelium. These capillaries are without a basement membrane but are surrounded by reticular fibers that separate them from the epithelium. The parathyroid vein leaves the gland at the hilus and empties into the nearby veins draining the thyroid and adjacent neck structures. The nerve supply is derived from the cervical sympathetic and consists of unmyelinated fibers of the vasomotor type.

The Histology of the Parathyroid Glands—Histologically the parathyroid glands consist of densely packed epithelial masses, strands and cords of cells throughout which course sinusoidal capillaries separated from the epithelium only by reticular fibers. There are two main types of cells, the principal or chief cells and the oxyphil or eosinophilic cells. The chief cells, which are said to be the only cells in the parathyroids up to the age of ten years, are pale and clear and granules are rarely noted in the cytoplasm. They vary in size from 6 to 8 microns in diameter and contain a nucleus which is large and vesicular. At times these cells are arranged in follicles in the lumen of which some colloid like material is found. This colloid substance consists of a homogenous protein material which lacks iodine. Parathyroid colloid when it is present generally appears after puberty. The eosinophil or oxyphil cells are larger than the clear cells, being 11 to 14 microns in diameter and the granular cytoplasm stains deeply with acid dyes. The nuclei are small and dense. Both dark and light oxyphil cells have been described. It is generally believed that the oxyphil cells are physiologically inert although parathyroid adenomata consisting of eosinophil cells have been reported in hyperparathyroidism. These cases, however, are not accepted by Castleman and Mallory.<sup>2</sup> Mitochondria and Golgi apparatus are present in both types of cells and in addition the chief cells usually contain glycogen and neutral fat. Large vacuolated water-clear cells have also been described. When small these cells resemble chief cells and for this reason Castleman and Mallory<sup>2</sup> have suggested that they represent transitional cells to indicate their derivation from the chief cells. These investigators<sup>2</sup> have proposed a monophyletic theory of origin of all the cells of the parathyroid, the chief cell being the parent cell from which both the water-clear cell and the oxyphil cell are derived.

The Physiology of the Parathyroid Glands—The physiologic actions of the parathyroid hormone are intimately concerned with the metabolism of calcium, phosphorus and bone. Calcium is normally ingested in the food and excreted through the urine and stool. Under normal circumstances the fecal loss exceeds that in the urine. This is in contrast to the far greater urinary excretion of calcium which is encountered in hyperparathyroidism. Since calcium is constantly being excreted by the organism, if the intake is greatly restricted a negative balance ensues. The daily adult requirement is approximately 1 gram. The availability of the ingested calcium depends on its absorption from the upper small intestine. Absorption of this electrolyte is favored by an increased acidity of the intestinal contents, a high vitamin D intake, a relatively low phosphorus content of the food and adequate digestion and absorption of fat. In general any agents or factors that will result in the precipitation of insoluble calcium salts, such as the presence of oxalates or phytic acid in the food, will decrease the absorption and therefore the availability of this ion. Under circumstances where the loss of calcium is excessive, such as occurs for example during lactation, a positive balance can only be obtained by greatly increasing the amount of calcium ingested.

Approximately 2 per cent of the body weight consists of calcium, almost all of which is found in the skeletal system. The normal calcium content of the serum varies from 9 to 11 mgm per cent. Only negligible amounts are found in the red blood corpuscles. In the serum calcium exists essentially in two forms. Approximately 45 per cent of the total serum calcium is bound to protein in the ratio of 0.84 mgm of calcium per gram of protein.<sup>4</sup> This moiety is nondiffusible and nonionized. The remainder of the serum calcium is diffusible and almost entirely ionized. A small portion of the diffusible fraction is perhaps bound in some sort of citrate like complex and is consequently nonionized. McLern and Hastings<sup>5</sup> have devised a nomogram which enables one to calculate directly the level of ionized calcium if the total serum calcium and the total serum protein are known based on the formula:

$$\text{pH} = 7.35$$

Calcium is found in other body fluids such as the lymph, aqueous humor, ascitic and edema fluids and the cerebrospinal fluid in lower concentrations than is present in the serum. The calcium content of the cerebrospinal fluid which is almost protein free is roughly equal to that of the diffusible fraction of serum. However the concentration of calcium in this compartment is not affected by alterations in the plasma diffusible calcium concentration induced by the injection of calcium salts nor is it altered following parathyroidectomy. The evidence would seem to indicate that the parathyroid hormone influences the diffusible rather than the non-diffusible calcium fraction<sup>24</sup> and that it is this former fraction which is physiologically active.<sup>25</sup> When the serum calcium level falls its urinary excretion decreases and ceases almost entirely when the serum level is below 7 mgm per cent.<sup>6</sup>

The body contains phosphorus in both organic and inorganic forms. The former fraction includes ester lipid and nucleic acid phosphorus. The blood contains considerably greater amounts of organic than inorganic phosphorus, the former being found for the most part in the cells. The inorganic fraction ordinarily varies from 3 to 4 mgm per cent and is distributed equally between the cells and plasma. It is with this latter fraction that we are particularly concerned. In general phosphorus is absorbed from the small intestine in inorganic form. Its absorption and consequent availability is favored by a low calcium intake, a high vitamin D intake and an increase in the acidity of the intestinal content. Normally it is excreted chiefly in the urine and somewhat less in the stool. The renal threshold for the serum phosphorus is 2 to 3 mgm per cent. The serum phosphorus may fall temporarily following the ingestion of carbohydrate or the administration of insulin since this ion plays an important role in the intermediary metabolism of carbohydrate. A reciprocal relationship exists between the concentration of the serum inorganic phosphorus and the serum calcium expressed by the formula  $(\text{Ca}^{++})(\text{PO}_4^{\text{m}}) = \text{K}$ . Although at times both may be reduced as in rickets normally in adults the product of the concentrations of serum calcium and serum inorganic phosphorus does not exceed and remains approximately constant at a value of 30 to 40. This indeed was the basis for the rule enunciated by Howland and Kramer<sup>10</sup> to the effect that in children where the constant ordinarily varies from 10 to 22 a reduction to less than 30 will result in rickets and when the value exceeds 40 the disorder will heal.

Bone consists of mineral impregnated osteoid tissue. The latter consists of a protein ground substance composed chiefly of ossein and to a much lesser extent of osseomucoid and albuminoid. Osteocytes osteoblasts, and osteoclasts are the cells normally located in the osteoid tissue. Approximately 80 per cent of the bone ash consists of  $\text{Ca}_3(\text{PO}_4)_2$ , 13 per cent of  $\text{CaCO}_3$  and  $\text{Mg}_3(\text{PO}_4)_2$  constitutes 2 per cent. The remaining 5 per cent is made up of K, Na, Cl, Fe and I. It has been suggested on the basis of x ray diffraction patterns and refractive indices that the bone salts exist for the major part in the form of  $\text{N Ca}_3(\text{PO}_4)_2$ ,  $\text{Ca}_2\text{N}_2$  or  $\text{CaCO}_3 \cdot \text{N Ca}_3(\text{PO}_4)_2$  (dahlite)<sup>11, 12</sup>

Bone may be formed either in an intramembranous or endochondral fashion but the essential processes are the same in both instances. Endochondral bone formation is characterized by a preliminary phase in which cartilage is broken down by osteoclasts and invaded by blood vessels. Subsequently osteoblasts lay down osteoid tissue which then becomes impregnated with bone salts. Intramembranous bone formation proceeds in the latter fashion without the preliminary cartilaginous phase. Fully developed bone therefore consists of mineral impregnated osteoid tissue laid down in circular pattern surrounding the vascular supply. Each pattern unit is referred to as a Haversian System. Osteocytes or bone cells are enclosed within bone. In areas where new bone is being formed osteoblasts may be observed in the periphery of the tissue while in regions of bone destruction osteoclasts are found. These latter cells resemble foreign body giant cells in appearance. The formation and destruction of normal bone goes on constantly and simultaneously. The nature of this dynamic equilibrium under normal circumstances is determined by a variety of factors such as the age of the individual, the physiological growth processes, nutrition, physical stress and strain, etc.

The function of the osteoblasts in the laying down of bone is a rather complicated one. These cells not only form the ground substance but also secrete alkaline phosphatase. The mechanism for the deposition of the mineral elements of bone is still not entirely settled. It has been hypothesized that calcium phosphate and the other bone salts are precipitated in the bony matrix because their solubility products are exceeded at the site of crystallization.<sup>13</sup> Albright<sup>14</sup> has suggested that the parathyroid hormone acts to maintain the serum concentration of calcium and of inorganic phosphorus at a level below their solubility product resulting in constant demineralization of bone. Nevertheless it has been presumed by this author as well as by others that mineral deposition continues because of a local increase in ions brought about by the presence of the enzymes alkaline phosphatase<sup>15</sup> and phosphorylase occurring at the site of calcification.<sup>16</sup> These enzymes then help liberate phosphate ions from organic sources. Phosphate thus being present in great excess its calcium salt is readily precipitated. Other mechanisms perhaps involving local alterations of pH may help explain the deposition of the carbonate salts.

The serum alkaline phosphatase is derived for the major part from bone where it is secreted in large quantities by the osteoblasts at the sites of active bone formation. In the absence of hepato-biliary disease the serum alkaline phosphatase may serve as an index of bone formation.

Whether the osteoclasts actively destroy bone or act as phagocytes in cleaning up bone debris is still unknown. However wherever and whenever bone destruction is proceeding these cells are found in great number. Whether they are derived from osteocytes or represent foreign body giant cells or a specific type of cell is obscure.

The Metabolic Effects of Parathyroid Hormone—When parathyroid hormone is administered to the experimental animal or to the human it is followed by an increase in the urinary excretion of phosphorus, a decrease in level of the serum inorganic phosphorus, an increase in the serum calcium level and an augmented urinary calcium excretion.<sup>17</sup> In addition its prolonged use results in bony changes characterized primarily by osteoporosis and by osteitis fibrosa. The biochemical antithesis of this is observed following the removal of the parathyroids. There occurs a decrease in the urinary excretion of phosphorus, an increase in the serum level of inorganic phosphorus associated with a fall in the serum calcium and a decrease in the urinary excretion of calcium. Parathyroid hormone ever increases no effect on the gastrointestinal absorption of calcium or its fecal excretion. The two most widely accepted hypotheses proposed to explain these phenomena are that the parathyroid hormone primarily regulates the renal excretion of phosphate ion<sup>18</sup> or that it directly acts to withdraw bone salts from the bone.<sup>18, 19, 20</sup> The arguments marshalled in favor of each of these theories have included facts which ostensibly directly support the proposed hypothesis as well as evidence incompatible with the opposing view. Albright and his associates<sup>1</sup> have demonstrated that the increase in the urinary excretion of phosphorus is the first effect noted following the administration of parathyroid hormone. In addition the urinary phosphate loss in comparison to the urinary calcium loss is greater than that observed when decalcification of bone is experimentally induced by the administration of acidifying salts such as ammonium chloride.<sup>1</sup> Although some observers have been unable to confirm their results Harrison and Harrison<sup>21</sup> demonstrated that the administration of parathyroid hormone resulted in a decrease in the renal tubular reabsorption of phosphate ion. Albright and his associates<sup>2</sup> were subsequently able to prevent the sequelae of parathyroid hormone administration on the urinary calcium and serum calcium by feeding phosphate and thereby preventing the fall in serum inorganic phosphorus.

The evidence for the theory that the parathyroid hormone acts directly on bone is chiefly histologic. Following the administration of this hormone marked osteoclastic proliferation in bone is observed. There are clinical evidences which are incompatible with this suggestion such as the fact that patients with active parathyroid tumors need not necessarily develop bone disease.<sup>22</sup> The level of the serum inorganic phosphorus moreover is reduced in this disorder as well as following the administration of parathyroid hormone in contrast to the high level which might be expected if this ion were constantly being liberated from bone. However the obser-value of 30 to 40. This indeed was the basis for the rule enunciated by Howland and Kramer<sup>10</sup> to the effect that in children where the constant ordinarily varies from 10 to 30 a reduction to less than 30 will result in rickets, and when the value exceeds 40 the disorder will heal.

Bone consists of mineral impregnated osteoid tissue. The latter consists of a protein ground substance composed chiefly of ossein and to a much lesser extent of osseomucoid and an albuminoid. Osteocytes, osteoblasts and osteoclasts are the cells normally located in the osteoid tissue. Approximately 80 per cent of the bone ash consists of  $\text{Ca}_3(\text{PO}_4)_2$ , 13 per cent of  $\text{CaCO}_3$  and  $\text{Mg}_3(\text{PO}_4)_2$  constitutes 2 per cent. The remaining 5 per cent is made up of K, Na, Cl, Fe and H. It has been suggested on the basis of x-ray diffraction patterns and refractive indices that the bone salts exist for the major part in the form of  $\text{N Ca}_3(\text{PO}_4)_2$ ,  $\text{Ca}_2\text{N}_2$  or  $\text{C}_7\text{CO}_3 \cdot \text{N Ca}_3(\text{PO}_4)_2$  (dahllite).<sup>11</sup>

Bone may be formed either in an intramembranous or endochondral fashion but the essential processes are the same in both instances. Endochondral bone formation is characterized by a preliminary phase in which cartilage is broken down by osteoclasts and invaded by blood vessels. Subsequently osteoblasts lay down osteoid tissue which then becomes impregnated with bone salts. Intramembranous bone formation proceeds in the latter fashion without the preliminary cartilaginous phase. Fully developed bone therefore, consists of mineral impregnated osteoid tissue laid down in circular pattern surrounding the vascular supply. Each pattern unit is referred to as a Haversian System. Osteocytes or bone cells are enclosed within bone. In areas where new bone is being formed osteoblasts may be observed in the periphery of the tissue while in regions of bone destruction osteoclasts are found. The mechanism for the deposition of the mineral elements of bone is still not entirely settled. It has been hypothesized that calcium phosphate and the other bone salts are precipitated in the bony matrix because their solubility products are exceeded at the site of crystallization.<sup>12</sup> Albright<sup>13</sup> has suggested that the parathyroid hormone acts to maintain the serum concentration of calcium and of inorganic phosphorus at a level below their solubility product resulting in constant demineralization of bone. Nevertheless it has been presumed by this author as well as by others, that mineral deposition continues because of a local increase in ions brought about by the presence of the enzymes alkaline phosphatase<sup>14</sup> and phosphorylase occurring at the site of calcification.<sup>15</sup> These enzymes then help liberate phosphate ions from organic sources. Phosphate thus being present in great excess its calcium salt is readily precipitated. Other mechanisms perhaps involving local alterations of pH may help explain the deposition of the carbonate salts.

The Chemistry of Parathyroid Hormone—The parathyroid hormone is probably a protein according to available evidence.<sup>4</sup> It is soluble in water, saline, aqueous alcohol, 94 per cent acetic acid, concentrated warm phenol and in warm 50 per cent glycerol but is insoluble in absolute ethyl methyl or butyl alcohol, ether, benzene, pyridine, carbon tetrachloride, methyl salicylate and anhydrous acetic acid. Ross and Wood<sup>19</sup> found two components to the hormone, one with a molecular weight of 15 000 to 25 000, the other with a molecular weight of 500 000 to 1 000 000. The hormone is fairly stable in a slightly acid media but is best preserved as a dry powder. It is stable to reducing agents but unstable to oxidizing agents. The U.S.P. IV unit is defined as one hundredth of the amount necessary to increase the serum calcium in not less than ten dogs 8 to 16 kilograms in weight an average of 1 mgm. per cent within sixteen to eighteen hours after subcutaneous injection. More recently in 1934 a method has been devised based on the fall of serum inorganic phosphorus in logarithmic proportion to the dose of parathyroid hormone administered.<sup>21</sup>

DISEASES OF THE PARATHYROID GLAND

Hypoparathyroidism.—Inadequate elaboration of the parathyroid hormone will result in hypoparathyroidism, the most overt manifestation of which is tetany. Although idiopathic hypoparathyroidism does occur, the most common cause of parathyroid insufficiency is the inadvertent removal or injury of the parathyroid glands occurring during the course of thyroid surgery. Postoperative hypoparathyroidism is encountered in approximately 1 per cent of the patients with Graves' disease subjected to thyroid surgery. In such instances the hypoparathyroidism may be either transient or permanent, depending upon whether the parathyroid bodies have actually been removed or subjected to injury from which recovery may take place. It might perhaps be mentioned that injury to the parathyroid bodies rarely if ever occurs following the use of radioactive iodine. In contrast to the relative frequency of postoperative hypoparathyroidism is the rarity of the idiopathic variety.<sup>22</sup> For example, by 1932 only 32 such instances had been reported in the literature.<sup>100</sup> In those patients in whom pathologic examination was subsequently carried out, no parathyroid tissue was found or else the glands were completely replaced by fat.<sup>23, 24</sup> The explanation for this form of parathyroid insufficiency is at present not apparent, particularly since no convincing evidence exists to link the parathyroid with the other endocrine glands.<sup>25, 26</sup> On several occasions, however, Addison's disease has been encountered in conjunction with hypoparathyroidism.<sup>27, 101</sup> In addition to true idiopathic hypoparathyroidism it is possible that some instances of infantile tetany may fall into this category.<sup>28</sup> Pertinent to this consideration is the report of an occasional infant with evidences of hypoparathyroidism born to a mother with hyperparathyroidism.<sup>29, 102</sup> In this case a possible explanation resides in the demonstration that parathyroid hormone can pass the fetal barrier and that the injection of parathyroid hormone to the experimental animal may result in parathyroid hypoplasia.<sup>30</sup> vation by Dent<sup>16</sup> that phosphite loss results in osteomalacia and not in osteitis fibrosa cystica would suggest that the action of the parathyroid hormone is not entirely on phosphite diuresis. Further evidence to suggest a possible direct effect of parathyroid hormone on bone is provided by the studies of Engel<sup>17</sup> who found that the administration of the hormone to experimental animals resulted in the solution of the glycoprotein ground substance of bone with a secondary rise in the serum mucoproteins proportional to the amount of parathyroid hormone administered.

The problem is to the mechanism by which parathyroid hormone exercises its effect could perhaps in part be elucidated by a study of the effects of this hormone in the bilaterally nephrectomized animal.<sup>18</sup> The results obtained in such preparations are partially obscured by the metabolic effects incidental to renal insufficiency. The majority of investigators have found that the administration of parathyroid hormone fails to induce an increase in the serum calcium in such animals.<sup>14,15</sup> These results however have generally been obtained in those instances in which the serum phosphorus has been elevated. On the other hand Ellisworth and Kutcher<sup>16</sup> did report some elevation in the serum calcium level under these experimental conditions. Albright and Reifenstein<sup>14</sup> have pointed out that it is impossible to raise the serum calcium level with parathyroid extract in patients with renal insufficiency and resulting phosphate retention. These data by no means exclude the possible direct action of parathyroid hormone on bone. The fact that no elevation of serum calcium occurs following its administration in the nephrectomized animal and in the patient with renal insufficiency can at least theoretically be explained by the local precipitation of calcium occurring in the presence of a markedly elevated phosphorus. That parathyroid hormone does exercise some effect directly on bone is shown by the fact that its administration to the nephrectomized animal results in the production of the bony changes of osteitis fibrosa beyond those which could be explained on the basis of acidosis and renal insufficiency alone.<sup>14,17</sup> It is probable that the hormone exercises its effects both by regulating the renal excretion of inorganic phosphorus and by its direct action on bone tissue.<sup>18,19</sup> Studies by Lacey and his associates<sup>20</sup> with radioactive phosphorus and by Birnbeck<sup>21</sup> with transplants of parathyroid tissue and bone would tend to support the dual action of this hormone.

The administration of excessive amounts of parathyroid hormone to the experimental animal will result in dehydration, renal failure and death. Shelling<sup>22</sup> has pointed out that in such experimental studies the characteristic features include a marked urinary diuresis with an increase in the urinary excretion of calcium, phosphorus and chlorides. There is an associated increase in the serum calcium level and a considerable reduction in serum sodium and chlorides. As the acute toxic state progresses hemoconcentration becomes marked and extrarenal azotemia with a retention of nitrogenous products results. The animal becomes anuric and death finally ensues from acidosis, dehydration and circulatory collapse. At postmortem extensive calcification is found in the kidneys, blood vessels, gastric mucosa, bronchioles and perialveolar regions of the lungs. In general metastatic calcifications are noted in those parts of the body where marked changes in pH occur.

At a serum calcium level of between 7.0 and 8.0 mgm per cent the clinical manifestations of tetany may not be overt. Under such circumstances evidences of tetany may be elicited by various tests. The more common of these include 1 Chvostek's sign 2 Trousseau's sign 3 Erb's sign and 4 the peroneal sign. The Chvostek sign is elicited by tapping the trunk of the facial nerve just anterior to the external auditory meatus or just below the zygomatic process. A positive sign consists of the contraction of the muscles of the upper lip on the tapped side of the alae nasae or of the muscles of the eyelids. Any one or all three of these manifestations may be present. Trousseau's sign is obtained by pressure upon the blood vessels and nerves of the extremity with sufficient pressure to stop the circulation temporarily. A positive sign is characterized by the production of carpopedal spasm. Erb's sign consists of an increased excitability of the motor nerves to galvanic current and for clinical purposes the cathodal opening contraction is the most useful of these electrical reactions. A contraction elicited with less than 5 milliamperes is usually pathognomonic of tetany. The peroneal or Lust sign consists of the mechanical stimulation of the peroneal nerve by tapping it at the lateral aspect of the fibula below the head. A positive test is evidenced by dorsal flexion and abduction of the foot. This test has the same significance as the Chvostek reaction. Of interest is an observation by Engel and his associates<sup>4</sup> in which they noted that if hypokalemia were associated with hypocalcemia tetany resulted only when the level of the serum potassium was elevated following the administration of this ion.

Less characteristic manifestations of hypoparathyroidism include cataract formation and multiple ectodermal disorders such as dry scaly skin, absence of hair and atrophy of nails.<sup>29, 40, 41</sup> Prompt and early treatment of hypoparathyroidism will prevent cataract formation but once formed regression does not occur. Convulsive seizures, sometimes epileptiform in character may occur in hypoparathyroidism. Whether such epilepsy is the result of hypoparathyroidism or represents true idiopathic epilepsy more readily precipitated by the hypoparathyroid state is a moot point.<sup>14, 22, 102</sup> In either event the successful treatment of the hypoparathyroidism will result in an amelioration of the convulsive seizures.

Gotta and Odoriz<sup>42</sup> conducted electroencephalographic studies in hypoparathyroidism. These investigators reported the presence of slow waves occurring 2 to 3 per second either singly or in series enhanced by hyperventilation but unaffected by the parenteral administration of calcium. The correction of the hypoparathyroid state results in a disappearance of the characteristic waves. In the associated presence of epilepsy the electroencephalogram may be entirely normal or show the presence of the slow waves, a generalized dysrhythmia or both. Rarely evidences of increased intracranial pressure and papilledema are observed.<sup>22, 103</sup> When these are associated with convulsion the diagnosis of brain tumor may be mistakenly made. Symmetrical bilateral punctate calcifications in the region of the basal ganglia are commonly noted on x-ray examination of the skull.<sup>27</sup> These will not be affected by successful treatment of the hypoparathyroidism.

Signs and Symptoms of Hypoparathyroidism — The most obvious and overt manifestation of hypoparathyroidism is tetany which in this disease is dependent on the associated hypocalcemia and the resultant increased neuromuscular excitability. The biochemical observations encountered in hypoparathyroidism consist primarily of a decrease in the urinary excretion of phosphorus, a rise in the level of serum inorganic phosphorus, a fall in the serum calcium level, and a decrease in the urinary excretion of calcium. Since calcium is an important regulator of neuromuscular function the reduction of the serum level of this ion will result in characteristic manifestations. When the serum calcium falls to a critical level, usually between 7.0 and 8.0 mgm per cent some of the signs and symptoms of tetany may be elicited. When the serum level falls below this point the full blown clinical picture is encountered. The level of the total serum calcium however is not the sole determining factor in the production of tetany. This manifestation can be precipitated by alkalemia in the presence of a normal total serum calcium level and prevented by acidosis when the serum calcium is at a level low enough ordinarily to be associated with tetany. The explanation for these phenomena resides in the fact that changes in the pH of the blood alter the degree of ionization of calcium. Since the available ionizable calcium determines its physiologic activity, the reduction of this fraction which occurs in alkalemia accounts for the occurrence of tetany even in the presence of a normal total serum calcium level. On the other hand the decrease in the pH of the blood occurring in acidosis will increase the available ionizable calcium. Finally the reduction in the total serum calcium which is so often found in hypoproteinemic states such as the nephrotic syndrome is infrequently associated with tetany. In such cases the available ionizable calcium is normal although that fraction ordinarily bound to protein is reduced.

The early manifestations of tetany consist of perioral paresthesia and numbness of the extremities followed by muscular spasms. Subsequently carpopedal spasm, laryngeal stridor and generalized convulsions may ensue. Although tetany is seldom fatal the occurrence of laryngeal spasm may be of serious import. Shelling<sup>52</sup> described this manifestation well.

The most frequent symptoms of manifest tetany are carpopedal spasm, laryngospasm and convulsions. The second frequent sign of manifest tetany especially in children is laryngospasm. The loud inspiratory crow is due to a spastic narrowing of the glottis. The spasm may be mild and may occur but infrequently or the attacks may follow in rapid succession and be accompanied by great difficulty in breathing, cyanosis, coma and death. In most instances however after a lapse of a few minutes and in spite of all signs of suffocation the spasm of the glottis relaxes, air is heard entering the larynx and the cyanosis begins to disappear. Spasm of both voluntary and involuntary musculature may be encountered. Tachycardia, irregularities in cardiac rhythm and prolongation of the QT intervals on electrocardiographic studies are evidences of the effects of hypocalcemia on the cardiac musculature while abdominal pain, nausea and vomiting point to the involvement of the musculature of the gastrointestinal tract.

tration of parathyroid hormone fails to induce an increase in the serum calcium a fall in serum phosphorus and an increase in the urinary excretion of calcium and phosphorus. Two hundred units of parathyroid hormone are administered intravenously to the fasting patient. The phosphorus content of the urine is measured hourly for periods of three hours prior to and five hours after the injection.<sup>45, 47</sup> Previous recent parathyroid hormone therapy must be excluded since refractoriness following the prolonged use of this fraction may normally occur. This test is invalid in the presence of chronic renal disease since under such circumstances the urinary excretion of phosphorus may be impaired. In addition false positive as well as false negative results have been reported with this procedure.<sup>48</sup>

Patients with pseudohypoparathyroidism respond equally well to either the administration of dihydrotachysterol (A.T. 10) or vitamin D.<sup>49</sup> The treatment therefore consists of the use of either A.T. 10 or vitamin D in addition to the oral administration of calcium. These measures are employed in the same dosage as is used in the treatment of true hypoparathyroidism.

Albright and his associates<sup>106</sup> have described a group of patients who present all the physical characteristics of pseudohypoparathyroidism but in whom the blood chemical findings are normal. These investigators refer to this group of patients as instances of pseudo pseudohypoparathyroidism and suggest that a genetic disorder which is probably incomplete is responsible for this syndrome.

Tetany in general may result from hypoparathyroidism from an inadequate intake or absorption of calcium as in rickets osteomalacia and steatorrhea from alkalosis induced by bicarbonate ingestion vomiting or hyperventilation from the excessive rise in serum inorganic phosphorus as in renal insufficiency from the administration of drugs that combine irreversibly with calcium ions such as oxalate and citrate and finally tetany may occur as a result of magnesium deprivation. An inadequate intake of calcium or a defect in the absorption of this element as occurs in steatorrhea or avitaminosis D may result in the infant in rickets or in the adult in osteomalacia. In these syndromes a low serum calcium is associated with either a normal or a slightly reduced serum phosphorus. The serum alkaline phosphatase is moderately increased as a result of the excessive deposition of osteoid which fails to become calcified.

In chronic renal insufficiency although the serum phosphorus is high and the serum calcium is low the urinary findings the elevated blood non protein nitrogen and the acidosis point to the underlying disease.

Allotetic tetany is usually easily differentiated by the presence of a normal serum calcium and phosphorus and a normal urinary excretion of these ions. In hyperventilation the CO<sub>2</sub> content of the blood is reduced but the combining power is usually normal. If the alkalosis is the result of the excessive ingestion of alkali the serum total base as well as the CO<sub>2</sub> combining power and content are increased. In alkalosis due to vomiting the CO<sub>2</sub> content and combining power are elevated the serum chlorides are reduced while total base may be normal or slightly reduced.

The Treatment of Hypoparathyroidism—The treatment of chronic hypoparathyroidism consists of the use of calcium salts and of either vita-

The skeletal changes in hypoparathyroidism are generally slight. In adults the bones may show a mild increase in density although rarely osteomalacia is found. In infants if the disorder starts before dentition is complete, aphasia or hypoplasia of the teeth may result.

The frequency with which the various manifestations occur in idiopathic hypoparathyroidism have been summarized by Steinberg and Waldron.<sup>100</sup> Tetany and convulsion occurred in most of the 52 patients reported while paresthesias, constipation, vomiting and psychoses occurred somewhat less commonly. Cataracts occurred in 52 per cent, poor dentition in 36.5 per cent, alterations in the skin nails or hair in 20 per cent, papilledema in 13.5 per cent, fungus infections in 13.5 per cent, mental retardation in 17 per cent, physical retardation in 18 per cent, chronic conjunctivitis in 38 per cent, and syndactylism and polydactylism each 19 per cent.

Diagnosis of Hypoparathyroidism — The diagnosis of hypoparathyroidism when suspected is established by the clinical and laboratory evidence of latent or manifest tetany including the Chvostek-Trousseau Erb and Lust signs and the characteristic biochemical alterations associated with this syndrome. These are: 1 a decrease in the serum calcium, 2 an increase in the serum phosphorus, 3 a decrease in the urinary excretion of calcium and phosphorus, 4 a normal or decreased serum alkaline phosphatase. When the serum calcium level is less than 7 to 8 mgm. per cent, calcinuria is absent. This may roughly and easily be determined by means of the Sulkowitch reagent. The intravenous calcium test of Howard Hopkins and Connor<sup>101</sup> is helpful in establishing the diagnosis of hypoparathyroidism as well as hyperparathyroidism. In patients with hypoparathyroidism the intravenous infusion of 10 mgm. of calcium gluconate per kilogram of body weight over a four hour period results in a marked increase in the twenty-four hour urinary excretion of phosphorus as compared to the control day. This is in contrast to what occurs in normal individuals where following such a calcium load test there is a considerable reduction in the urinary excretion of phosphorus.

Differential Diagnosis — Pseudohypoparathyroidism (Seibricht-Bantam Syndrome) and tetany due to causes other than true hypoparathyroidism must be differentiated from true hypoparathyroidism. In 1942 Albright<sup>46</sup> and his associates described 3 patients presenting a syndrome clinically and biochemically similar to hypoparathyroidism who failed, however, to respond to the administration of parathyroid hormone. Since then other similar cases have been reported<sup>45, 47, 98, 104</sup> including several instances of multiple occurrence in the same family. These patients in addition to the usual clinical and biochemical features of hypoparathyroidism present certain characteristics. Their physical appearance is similar in that all are short and thickset and have rounded faces. In addition they have a tendency to brachydactyly especially of the metacarpals as a result of early closure of the epiphyses. The metacarpals most likely to show shortening are those in which cartilage proliferation and epiphyseal formation are first to occur. In some instances excessive soft tissue calcification is observed. It has been suggested that this syndrome may be genetically determined and that the major defect lies in the excessive tubular reabsorption of phosphate.<sup>105</sup> The diagnosis is established by the observation that the admini-tration of parathyroid hormone fails to induce an increase in the serum calcium and fall in serum phosphorus and an increase in the urinary excretion of calcium and phosphorus. Two hundred units of parathyroid hormone are administered intravenously to the fasting patient. The phosphorus content of the urine is measured hourly for periods of three hours prior to and five hours after the injection.<sup>4, 47</sup> Previous recent parathyroid hormone therapy must be excluded since refractoriness following the prolonged use of this fraction may normally occur. This test is invalid in the presence of chronic renal disease since under such circumstances the urinary excretion of phosphorus may be impaired. In addition false positive as well as false negative results have been reported with this procedure.<sup>48</sup>

Patients with pseudohypoparathyroidism respond equally well to either the administration of dihydrotachysterol (AT 10) or vitamin D.<sup>49</sup> The treatment therefore consists of the use of either AT 10 or vitamin D in addition to the oral administration of calcium. These measures are employed in the same dosage as is used in the treatment of true hypoparathyroidism.

Albright and his associates<sup>50</sup> have described a group of patients who present all the physical characteristics of pseudohypoparathyroidism but in whom the blood chemical findings are normal. These investigators refer to this group of patients as instances of pseudo pseudohypoparathyroidism and suggest that a genetic disorder which is probably incomplete is responsible for this syndrome.

The Treatment of Hypoparathyroidism—The treatment of chronic hypoparathyroidism consists of the use of calcium salts and of either vita-

mm D or dihydrotachysterol (AT-10) The usefulness of parathyroid hormone is limited to acute hypoparathyroidism since refractoriness to the fraction may develop In acute hypoparathyroidism such as occurs following thyroid surgery or the removal of a parathyroid adenoma the treatment of choice is the repeated intravenous use of calcium gluconate In addition as adjuvant therapy parathormone may be administered intramuscularly in dosages of 10 to 100 units a day either in one dose or in divided doses Its effect on the serum calcium level is observable within four hours and persists for approximately twenty to twenty four hours Unfortunately refractoriness to this hormone may occur within one to three weeks In acute emergencies calcium should be repeatedly administered intravenously preferably as the gluconate in dosage of 10 cc of a 10 to 20 per cent solution When considering the oral administration of calcium it should be remembered that calcium is best absorbed in the presence of a low phosphoric acid diet Consequently the chloride or the lactate or gluconate rather than the phosphate salts are usually employed Milk is to be avoided because of its high phosphate content Aluminum hydroxide may be used as an adjuvant in doses of 1 to 2 tea spoonfuls 3 times a day This drug combines with and precipitates the phosphoric thereby facilitating the absorption of calcium

Vitamin D has a dual action it enhances the intestinal absorption of calcium and possibly aids in the deposition of bone and to a much lesser extent increases the renal excretion of phosphate Dihydrotachysterol (AT-10) has similar actions but its phosphate regulating effect is more pronounced and the antirachitic action less potent One may therefore employ either of these two compounds in the treatment of hypoparathyroidism Vitamin D or calciferol ( $D_2$ ) is given in doses of 50 000 to 300 000 international units daily Dihydrotachysterol (AT-10) is administered in daily dosages of 3 cc (375 mgm) or 6 capsules each containing 0.625 mgm until the presence of calcium is detected in the urine The dosage is then reduced approximately to 1 cc or 2 capsules 3 to 7 times a week The use of the Sulkowitch reagent is of great value in adjusting the dosage the proper dose being that sufficient to produce a moderate amount of calcium in the urine Benemid has been reported to lower the serum phosphorus level and to increase the urinary excretion of phosphorus in patients with hypoparathyroidism Although in the instances described there occurred no change in the serum calcium level there did occur a disappearance of the symptoms of tetany The drug was employed in a dosage of 1 to 4 grains a day administered orally<sup>10</sup>

Hyperparathyroidism

Hyperparathyroidism results from hyperfunction of one or more of the parathyroid glands This functional overactivity may be due to either diffuse hyperplasia of all of the parathyroids or more commonly a parathyroid tumor which is almost invariably benign For both theoretical and practical reasons it is important to distinguish these forms of primary hyperparathyroidism from secondary hyperparathyroidism such as may result from chronic renal insufficiency. Secondary hyperparathyroidism is always associated with diffuse hyperplasia of the parathyroid bodies.

Whatever the underlying pathologic cause of primary hyperparathyroidism the physiologic and clinical sequelæ are similar and resemble the effects induced by the exogenous administration of excessive parathyroid hormone. This is characterized primarily by the increased urinary excretion of phosphorus and calcium, a decrease in the level of the serum inorganic phosphorus and an increase in serum calcium level. The clinical manifestations are dependent on these phenomena which result in a disease picture chiefly referable to the skeletal system and urinary tract to the symptoms of parathyroid intoxication or to various combinations of these.

The most common cause of primary hyperparathyroidism is a parathyroid adenoma. The comparative incidence of tumor and hyperplasia in this disorder is reflected in the number of cases of each reported in the literature. Primary hyperparathyroidism due to adenoma was recorded in 322<sup>7</sup> instances, carcinoma in 7<sup>58, 63</sup> and diffuse hyperplasia in 27<sup>60, 64</sup>. Of 104 cases in a series studied at the Massachusetts General Hospital 84 were due to a single tumor, 7 to two adenomata, and 10 to diffuse hypertrophy. In this group 3 instances of carcinoma were also encountered.<sup>64</sup>

Parathyroid adenomata consist for the most part of chief or water-clear cells.<sup>14, 59</sup> Oxyphil adenomata have been reported in rare instances<sup>65, 7</sup> although the actual existence of such tumors is subject to some question.<sup>8</sup> However in the adenomata encountered all three types of cells, chief, water clear and oxyphil may be present. The oxyphil or eosinophil cells are present in only small numbers.<sup>8</sup> This is in contrast to diffuse primary hyperplasia in which the sole cells found are large water clear cells.<sup>14, 60</sup> Norris<sup>57</sup> collected 322 cases of functioning parathyroid adenomata from the literature. He noted that in only 6.2 per cent was more than one parathyroid tumor found. In 12 of these however advanced renal disease was present. Albright and Reifenstein<sup>14</sup> also reported the incidence of multiple tumors in their series to be 6 per cent. Multiple tumors therefore are uncommon. When more than two glands are involved it is probable that the underlying lesion is hyperplasia rather than tumor.<sup>58</sup>

In the series collected by Norris<sup>57</sup> the adenomata were equally distributed between the right and left glands but occurred far more commonly in the inferior group than in the superior parathyroid bodies in a ratio of approximately 5 to 1. In 10 per cent of the cases the adenoma was found in an aberrant location. In almost two thirds of this last group the tumor presented in the mediastinum and in slightly less than one third the tumor was embedded in the thyroid. The remainder were found behind the esophagus.

The age distribution in general varied from ten to eighty years. The maximum incidence occurred in the group between forty and fifty years and 70 per cent occurred between the ages of thirty to sixty years. There was a marked predominance in females, the ratio to males being 3 to 1.

The tumors varied in size from 0.4 to 120 grams, the average weight being 12.5 grams. They were ellipsoid in most instances but some were bilobed. In general the tumors were yellowish brown or reddish brown in color, moderately soft, encapsulated and smooth. A rough quantitative proportion was found to exist between the size of the tumor and the degree of hyperparathyroidism.

Of interest are the reports of adenomatous enlargement of the parathyroids in conjunction with adenohypophyseal and pancreatic islet cell tumors.<sup>61-62-109</sup> The significance of such findings is at present not apparent particularly since no definitive experimental demonstration of any functional interrelationship between these glands has been established.

Diffuse hypertrophy and hyperplasia of all the parathyroid glands causing primary hyperparathyroidism has been described.<sup>64-65-110</sup> Eight such instances were found in the 89 cases reported from the Massachusetts General Hospital.<sup>14</sup> In 1947 Rogers and Keating<sup>60</sup> reviewed 26 cases including 4 of their own. This type of primary hyperparathyroidism can generally be differentiated both clinically and histologically from the diffuse hyperplasia encountered in secondary hyperparathyroidism. The parathyroid cells in the former are large and water-clear, 10 to 40 microns in diameter and often arranged in alveolar fashion while in secondary hyperparathyroidism the cells are normal or slightly increased in size. In the series of primary hyperplasia reported from the Massachusetts General Hospital the total weight of the parathyroids ranged from 20 to 160 times that of normal glands varying from 25 to 190 grams.<sup>14</sup>

Carcinoma of the parathyroids is rare. In 1948 Norris<sup>18</sup> was able to collect only 15 cases which were acceptable as true malignant parathyroid tumors. Of these only 7 were endocrinologically active and resulted in hyperparathyroidism. Since the report by Norris other instances have been recorded.<sup>63-109-110</sup> At operation the most reliable clue to the presence of malignant change in the parathyroid tumor is a fibrous inflammation like reaction which surrounds the tumor and binds it to the adjacent structures. Such changes are not observed in hyperplastic parathyroid bodies or in adenomas.<sup>110</sup>

The Bone Changes in Primary Hyperparathyroidism—The bone changes in primary clinical hyperparathyroidism are almost identical with those observed in the experimental animal treated parenterally with parathyroid extract.<sup>62-65</sup> In general the changes consist of a generalized decalcification of bone, a marked increase in the fibrous tissue of the bone marrow associated with the presence of increased numbers of osteoblasts and osteoclasts, the presence of bone cysts and giant cell tumors, and evidences of bone destruction and to a less marked degree of new bone formation. The histologic characteristics of the bony changes have been summarized by Snapper as follows:<sup>111</sup>

- 1 Osteoclastic destruction of bone trabeculae due to hyperactivity and accumulation of osteoclasts, sometimes leading to formation of giant cell tumors.

- 2 Decalcification of the remnants of bone trabeculae.

- 3 Apart from this osteoclastic decalcification and perhaps on account of it, generalized proliferation of fibrous tissue is found in the bone marrow and cortex—the osteitis fibrosa described by von Recklinghausen.

- 4 The thinned bone trabeculae are often perforated by the proliferating fibrous tissue, the so-called dissecting bone resorption.

- 5 New formation of bone tissue as indicated by the proliferation of osteoblasts and the presence of osteoid seams.

It is this last feature that accounts for the high serum alkaline phosphatase associated with these skeletal changes.

It is now generally accepted that osteitis fibrosa is not pathognomonic of von Recklinghausen's disease. This specific change is observed also in Paget's disease, polyostotic fibrous dysplasia, Graves disease, renal osteodystrophy, long standing acidosis, and other disorders. It would appear that this type of fibrous alteration is a non specific reaction to rapid decalcification of bone. This is readily demonstrated in the experimental animal where rapid decalcification induced by acids is result in osteitis fibrosa similar to that which follows the administration of parathyroid extract.<sup>24</sup> Finally nonspecific agents such as chloroform and lead acetate may produce similar changes.<sup>25</sup>

The giant cell tumors which occur in primary hyperparathyroidism are neither malignant nor neoplastic. The tumors which are sometimes referred to as osteoclastomas<sup>26</sup> or osteoblastoma<sup>27</sup> consist of boneless masses of soft tissue composed of osteoblasts, osteoclasts and the supporting cells of the bone marrow. They probably represent areas where the rapid and marked destruction of bone is associated with a local increase in the osteoclasts and osteoblasts. Frequently the lesions are brown in color due to the presence of blood pigments resulting from the phagocytosis of red cells

The most common locations for the giant cell tumors and bone cysts are the jaws and zygoma the metacarpals and metatarsals and the ends of long bones. The bone cysts are probably degenerative in origin and are usually located at sites where previous trauma and hemorrhage have occurred. It is questionable as to whether the cysts are the result of degenerative changes in giant cell tumors. Following the successful treatment of primary hyperparathyroidism the giant cell tumors generally disappear while the cysts persist although they may undergo calcification.

The bones which show the greatest degree of change are usually the long tubular bones particularly in the diaphyses and next in order of frequency the vertebral column pelvis skull jaw bones thoracic flat bones and the short tubular bones.

Symptoms of Primary Hyperparathyroidism — The symptoms and signs of hyperparathyroidism may include skeletal renal and gastrointestinal manifestations in a variety of combinations. Not infrequently however the predominant clinical picture is referable to either the skeletal or the urinary system alone. Occasionally evidence of acute parathyroid intoxication is encountered.

The skeletal manifestations usually referred to as von Recklinghausen's disease are dependent on the marked negative calcium balance as well as on the direct effects of parathyroid hormone on bone. The resultant decalcification and bony alterations result in indefinite skeletal pains which are often erroneously attributed to arthritis, bursitis or more loosely 'neuritis'. Bone tenderness is commonly found. Multiple pathologic fractures occur and deformities of the long bones, pelvis and spine are thus produced. The x ray is of particular value in von Recklinghausen's disease.

Although all the bones of the skeleton are involved the effect are more pronounced in some areas than in others. In general there is thinning and scalloping of the cortex and widening of the marrow spaces. In addition there is a porous appearance of bone due to dilatation of the Haversian canals as well as decalcification and spontaneous fractures.<sup>43</sup> The compression and collapse of the softened vertebral bodies result in shortening of the patients and the appearance of fish bone biconcave vertebrae on x ray examination. Bone cysts and giant cell tumors are frequently but not invariably present and as previously described are most often noted in the bones of the skull or jaw or zygoma, the metacarpals, metatarsals and ends of long bones. The presence of such tumors and bone cysts is particularly significant in establishing the diagnosis. The roentgenologic appearance of coarsely meshed trabeculation and diffuse osteoporosis is often sufficient to strongly suggest the diagnosis. The clubbing of the fingers sometimes seen in this disease is associated with decalcification of the bones of the hand and fingers and absorption of the terminal phalanges. Hyperparathyroidism is often first detected by the dentist who may find an epulis of the jaw or an absence of the lamina dura of the teeth. The latter is of great significance for when present it is indicative of a generalized osteoporosis.<sup>44</sup>

Marked polyuria and polydipsia are frequently observed in primary hyperparathyroidism. The polyuria appears to be greater than could be anticipated from the degree of hypercalcemia and hyperphosphaturia. The therapeutic and experimental administration of parathyroid hormone results in at least a temporary loss of water, inorganic base and chloride and when the hormone is withdrawn the substances are retained. Following the successful removal of a parathyroid adenoma temporary oliguria may occur.

The renal manifestations include nephrolithiasis and nephrocalcinosis both of which have their origin in the alterations in the serum and urinary calcium. The nephrolithiasis is dependent on the precipitation of calcium phosphate and oxalate stones as a result of the marked hypercalcemia. Stone formation is favored by urinary obstruction, infection and an alkaline reaction in the urine. It has been reported that 3 to 5 per cent of all renal calculi are due to underlying hyperparathyroidism.<sup>45-51</sup> Repeated episodes of pyelonephritis and obstruction which so commonly occur in the presence of urolithiasis may result in renal insufficiency. Nephrocalcinosis is due to both metastatic calcification resulting from the hypercalcemia and to the precipitation of calcium salts in the lumen of the renal tubules. Calcification in the interstitium of the kidney particularly around the tubules is favored by the local changes in the pH. The intratubular precipitation of calcium is similar in origin to that discussed for nephrolithiasis. The diagnosis of nephrocalcinosis is based on the x ray detection of calcification within the renal shadow. The presence of calcium casts in the urine is not pathognomonic of nephrocalcinosis but suggests the presence of hyperparathyroidism. It should be emphasized that renal insufficiency may result from nephrocalcinosis even in the absence of x ray demonstration of renal calcification. Early in the course of this disorder only the

Although the serum inorganic phosphorus concentration is usually reduced this is not invariably the case and it may even be increased in the presence of renal insufficiency. Of a series of 79 proven cases of primary hyperparathyroidism in only a little less than half was the serum inorganic phosphorus level below 2.5 mgm per cent<sup>59</sup>

The demonstration of an increase in the urinary excretion of calcium and a negative calcium balance is significant in establishing the diagnosis of hyperparathyroidism in suspicious cases. Under normal circumstances 70 to 90 per cent of the daily calcium intake is accounted for in the stool and only 10 to 30 per cent is excreted in the urine. In hyperparathyroidism this relationship is reversed and this fact may be utilized for the diagnosis. The patient is placed on a low calcium diet containing approximately 100 mgm a day for 2 successive three-day periods. On this regimen the daily urinary calcium excretion will not exceed 100 mgm in normal subjects. The daily urinary excretion of 150 mgm or more is suggestive of hyperparathyroidism<sup>70</sup> Hypocalcemia may be absent in the presence of renal tubules are damaged later glomerular dilatation and impaired filtration occur. In such instances following successful operation the glomerular function may return to normal but tubular function remains impaired.

The question of the relative incidence of nephrolithiasis and of skeletal manifestations is an important one. It is generally recognized that the predominance of the manifestations is to some extent determined by the daily dietary intake of calcium. In the presence of a high calcium diet nephrolithiasis will more likely occur while in patients whose daily dietary intake of calcium is low skeletal manifestations will be more common.

In the series studied at the Massachusetts General Hospital 52 of the first 62 cases observed had nephrolithiasis or nephrocalcinosis.<sup>44</sup> In the same series only 35 had bone disease. In the series of 322 cases collected by Norris,<sup>47</sup> skeletal lesions alone were encountered in 60 per cent, renal changes alone in 5 per cent, and associated skeletal and renal manifestations in 31 per cent. Involvement of neither system was found in 15 per cent. It should be remembered that hyperparathyroidism must be present for a considerable period of time, generally years, before roentgen evidences of skeletal change are detectable. On the other hand renal calculi form rather quickly. As a consequence it might be expected that with earlier detection of the disease the relative incidence of renal manifestations will increase. A possible explanation of the high incidence of renal complications encountered in this country is probably related to the high calcium content of the American diet.<sup>48</sup> In Europe where milk is not an important adult food and the calcium intake in general low skeletal changes are more frequently encountered.

Hypercalcemia results in decreased excitability of muscle in contrast to the hyperexcitability characteristic of hypoparathyroidism. The clinical evidence of this is the marked hypotonia and decreased electrical reactions of skeletal muscle phenomena not uncommonly seen in these patients.<sup>49-54</sup> The lack of tone resulting from this muscular effect of hypercalcemia affects the gastrointestinal musculature as well. As a result anorexia, constipation, nausea and vomiting are not infrequent. The electrocardiographic tracing shows a shortening of the Q-T interval.

The hypercalcemia may produce a peculiar band keratitis, as well as deposits of calcium in the deep conjunctivæ of the palpebral fissure,<sup>55</sup> while the marked osteitis fibrosa may result in anemia and leukopenia.

Norris<sup>47</sup> has estimated that the average duration of the disease before the diagnosis is established is approximately 5 to 7 years, although this obviously varies with the character of the manifestations and the index of suspicion of the physician. See Table 28.

The Diagnosis of Primary Hyperparathyroidism—The diagnosis is based essentially on the presence of the characteristic clinical, skeletal and renal abnormalities and the presence of the typical biochemical changes. The latter include an increase in the urinary excretion of phosphorus and calcium, a decrease in the serum level of inorganic phosphorus, an elevation in the serum calcium level and an increase in the serum alkaline phosphatase. The serum calcium level is generally elevated above 11.0 mgm. per cent and usually exceeds 12 mgm. per cent. Of the 114 cases collected by Gutman and his associates the serum calcium level was greater than 11.0

syndrome. Bone cysts and giant cell tumors are not found in osteoporosis and only rarely is the lamina dura absent. Immobilization osteoporosis particularly in children is clinically somewhat different from the osteoporosis of other etiologies. In immobilized patients the excessive liberation of calcium from bone results in an increase in the serum calcium level while the serum inorganic phosphorus remains normal or may even be slightly elevated. As in other instances of osteoporosis the serum alkaline phosphatase shows no change. Hypercalciuria is marked. When these patients are permitted activity however recalcification promptly occurs and the biochemical abnormalities vanish. In senile osteoporosis Spencer and her associates<sup>11</sup> found that following the intravenous infusion of 30 cc of 10 per cent calcium gluconate over a four hour period the calcium retention over the subsequent twenty four hour period was considerably less than that observed either in normal individuals or in patients with hyperparathyroidism.

Albright and Reifenstein<sup>12</sup> have classified the causes of osteoporosis as follows:

I Defects in Osteoblasts

- A Loss of Stress and Strain
  - 1 Atrophy of Disuse
- B Lack of Estrogen
  - 1 Postmenopausal State
  - 2 Ovarian Agenesis
- C Congenital Osteoblastic Defect
  - 1 Osteogenesis Imperfecta

II Defect in Matrix

- A Loss of Androgen
  - 1 Eunuchoidism
  - 2 Senile Osteoporosis
- B Loss of Protein
  - 1 Malnutrition
  - 2 Hypovitaminosis C
  - 3 Cushing's Syndrome
  - 4 Alarm Reaction

III Effect Unknown

- A Acromegaly
- B Idiopathic Osteoporosis

In osteomalacia and rickets there is generalized decalcification and absence of the lamina dura but tumors and cysts are rarely found. The deformities encountered in osteomalacia and rickets are due to bowing of the weakened bones rather than to true fractures. Pseudofractures do however occur in that form of osteomalacia known as Milman's Syndrome which is due to avitaminosis D. In rickets and in osteomalacia the concentration of the serum inorganic phosphorus is reduced while the alkaline phosphatase is elevated. These laboratory findings are similar to those observed in hyperparathyroidism. In the former disease however insufficiency or if hyperparathyroidism is complicated by coexistent avitaminosis D.<sup>108</sup> A rough clinical guide for the presence of hypercalcemia is afforded by the use of the Sulkowitch reagent. A heavy fasting urinary precipitate is suggestive of hypercalcemia and hence hypercalcemia. In hyperparathyroidism the intravenous calcium load test results in very little change in the urinary excretion of phosphorus. This is in contrast to the marked phosphate diuresis observed in hypoparathyroidism under the circumstances of the test and the reduction in the urinary excretion of this ion in normal individuals.<sup>107</sup>

Where skeletal manifestations are prominent and there is active deposition of osteoid and bone the serum alkaline phosphatase is usually elevated above 120 King Armstrong units and above 50 Bodansky units in adults.<sup>77, 79</sup> However in the absence of skeletal changes the serum alkaline phosphatase level may be normal. This determination is therefore best employed as an index of new bone formation rather than a diagnostic criterion of hyperparathyroidism since it may not be increased in this disease and is increased in a variety of other bone diseases in which active new bone formation takes place. The finding of a normal serum alkaline phosphatase value in the presence of roentgen evidence of bony changes is a strong point against the diagnosis of hyperparathyroidism.

Differential Diagnosis — Hyperparathyroidism must be differentiated from 1 skeletal lesions which mimic it 2 other causes of hypercalcemia and 3 renal lesions associated with calculi nephrocalcinosis and renal insufficiency.

The confusing skeletal lesions include osteoporosis from any cause osteomalacia and rickets osteogenesis imperfecta polyostotic fibrous dysplasia Paget's disease solitary bone cyst multiple myeloma and metastatic malignancy. Other bone diseases less likely to be confused with hyperparathyroidism include lymphoma Caucher's disease xanthomatosis chronic radium poisoning benign metastasizing hemangioma and renal osteitis fibrosa generalisata. The chief causes of hypercalcemia which must be distinguished from hyperparathyroidism are hypervitaminosis D Boeck's sarcoidosis and hypercalcemia resulting from the excessive ingestion of milk and alkali.

The important renal syndromes which may be confused with hyperparathyroidism are those producing nephrocalcinosis such as lower nephron nephrosis resulting in renal acidosis the secondary hyperparathyroidism of renal insufficiency and the syndrome due to immobilization.

Osteoporosis not due to hyperparathyroidism is distinguished by several features. Except for the osteoporosis resulting from immobilization the serum calcium and phosphorus levels are usually within the normal range and since no new bone is formed the serum alkaline phosphatase is not increased. Although early in the course of the osteoporosis the urinary excretion of phosphorus and calcium may be excessive in the later stages the amounts excreted are considerably reduced. This is in contrast to what is generally observed in hyperparathyroidism where in spite of marked demineralization of the skeleton excessive urinary loss of these elements continues. The skull is rarely involved in osteoporosis in contrast to hyperparathyroidism. A possible exception to this is the osteoporosis of Cushing's azotemia have been reported. In multiple myeloma the serum alkaline phosphatase is rarely if ever elevated and in the presence of bone disease is a strong point against the diagnosis of hyperparathyroidism. The presence of Bence-Jones protein in the urine, an increase in the serum globulin content and the identification of myeloma cells on sternal marrow aspiration serve to establish the diagnosis of multiple myeloma.

Metastatic malignancy is readily differentiated from primary hyperparathyroidism. In the former the lesions are sharply demarcated within otherwise normal bone. Occasionally diffuse decalcification occurs. The concentration of serum calcium may be elevated especially after treatment with androgens and hypercalcemia and nephrolithiasis may result. The concentration of the serum phosphorus however is usually normal occasionally increased and but rarely decreased. The serum alkaline phosphatase may be increased in the presence of osteoblastic types of metastases. The more likely sources of the primary lesions are the breast, prostate, kidney, bronchi and thyroid gland.

Hypercalcaemia may result in metastatic calcification and the clinical manifestations associated with hypercalcemia including polyuria, polydipsia and impaired renal function. The distinction from hyperparathyroidism is based on the history of prolonged ingestion of large amounts of vitamin D.

In Boeck's sarcoidosis hypercalcemia,<sup>25</sup> hypercalcaemia, nephrolithiasis and high serum alkaline phosphatase and bone lesions have been reported.<sup>26</sup> The serum inorganic phosphorus however is not reduced and hyperproteinemia and hyperglobulinemia are almost constant findings. Generalized lymphadenopathy is frequently present and perhaps more commonly a bilateral hilar adenopathy. The presence of pulmonary lesions adds additional support for this diagnosis. Further aid in the differentiation from hyperparathyroidism is provided by the facts that the bone lesions in sarcoidosis are usually confined to the hands and feet and generalized demineralization is not observed. Finally, the diagnosis of Boeck's sarcoidosis may be established by a positive Dickerson Keim test and the characteristic histologic appearance of biopsied tissue.

The excessive and prolonged intake of milk and alkali have been reported to produce a syndrome characterized by 1 hypercalcemia without hypercalcaemia, 2 a normal or elevated serum phosphorus level, 3 impaired renal function with retention of non protein nitrogen and occasionally with nephrocalcinosis, 4 conjunctival calcium deposits and band keratitis and 5 the clinical improvement which follows the decrease in the serum calcium level resulting from a decreased calcium intake.<sup>27, 28</sup>

Nephrocalcinosis resulting from hyperparathyroidism must be differentiated from other causes of renal calcification such as lower nephron nephrosis due to heavy metal poisoning particularly mercury and hyperchloremic nephrocalcinosis, hypervitaminosis D and more rarely renal tuberculosis and chronic diffuse glomerulonephritis.<sup>29, 30</sup> Hyperchloremic nephrocalcinosis presumably represents a congenital defect in which there is impairment in the ability of the renal tubules to reabsorb bicarbonate. As a consequence of this defect there is a continuous urinary drain of fixed both the serum calcium level and the urinary excretion of calcium are depressed in contrast to that in hyperparathyroidism.

Osteogenesis imperfecta sometimes loosely referred to as brittle bones is easily differentiated from hyperparathyroidism. It is an hereditary disorder, associated with blue sclera and multiple fractures beginning in very early infancy. The fractures, surprisingly, occur through the thickest rather than the thinnest portions of bone. When the disease is detected later in life, x ray studies reveal a thin but not decalcified skull and an intact lamina dura of the teeth. The serum alkaline phosphatase may be elevated but the serum calcium and phosphorus levels, as well as the urinary excretion of these ions are within the normal range.

Polyostotic fibrous Dysplasia is characterized by 1 a disseminated but not generalized osteitis fibrosa usually of segmental distribution 2 precocious puberty especially in females and 3 cutaneous pigmentation. It is differentiated easily from hyperparathyroidism by the facts that in the former disease (a) the uninvolved areas of bone are completely normal (b) the lesions are hyperostotic as well as hypoostotic, and (c) the serum concentrations of calcium and inorganic phosphorus are normal although the serum alkaline phosphatase may be elevated. There is no increase in the urinary excretion of calcium.

Solitary bone cysts are particularly apt to occur at the ends of long bones and often lead to pathologic fracture. Although they are histologically indistinguishable from those seen in hyperparathyroidism and in polyostotic fibrous dysplasia they are not accompanied by any other evidences of disease.

Paget's disease may be a localized or disseminated process and has as its sites of predilection the lumbar spine pelvis femurs clavicles tibiae and skull. In this disease the architecture of the new bone is abnormal and the cortex is thickened. Marked thickening of the periosteum and diffuse swelling of those bones which are involved is common. Bone cysts and giant cell tumors are rarely if ever seen and the involved bones are non-tender. This is in contrast to the thin cortex normal architecture the localized swelling of cysts and giant cell tumors and the bony tenderness observed in von Recklinghausen's disease. Hypercalciuria and nephrolithiasis may occur in Paget's disease but these are relatively uncommon. The serum concentrations of calcium and inorganic phosphorus are normal but the serum alkaline phosphatase may be inordinately elevated.

Multiple myeloma is characterized by the presence on x ray examination of multiple sharply demarcated punched-out lesions. These are especially significant if localized to the skull but may also be seen in the pelvis ribs spine and long bones. Not infrequently it may be difficult to differentiate this disease from hyperparathyroidism since diffuse decalcification of the skeleton frequently occurs. In approximately 10 per cent of the patients with multiple myeloma the serum calcium level may be elevated and in such instances the urinary excretion of this ion is increased and nephrolithiasis may occur. Myeloma kidney may follow the deposition of protein in the renal tubules. Chronic renal insufficiency and secondary hyperparathyroidism may result. Indeed two instances of parathyroid hyperplasia in patients with multiple myeloma and hypercalciuria and is located in the usual sites the exploratory procedure is incomplete unless the mediastinum is carefully searched.

Where primary hyperparathyroidism is due to diffuse hyperplasia of the parathyroid glands rather than to a discrete tumor the procedure of choice is the removal of three parathyroid bodies and the subtotal resection of the fourth. At least 200 mgm. of viable gland tissue with an adequate and uncompromised blood supply are left behind.

After operation the serum calcium level drops promptly and may reach normal levels within twenty-four to thirty-six hours. The greater the initial serum calcium concentration the greater is the likelihood that symptoms of tetany will occur postoperatively. Within thirty-six to forty-eight hours after operation the serum calcium level often falls below the normal range and the signs of low calcium tetany become evident. Failure of the serum calcium level to fall is indicative of the presence of another tumor if one has been removed or in the case of diffuse hyperplasia of inadequate resection. With the decrease in serum calcium concentration the urinary excretion of this ion is diminished but at a somewhat slower rate. This is clinically evidenced by the fact that patients with overt tetany may continue to excrete calcium in the urine for two to three days after operation. By the fourth postoperative day, however, calcium is usually no longer detectable in the urine.

Postoperative tetany generally falls into three categories. The first is transient in character and is dependent on the temporary functional inactivity of the remaining parathyroid tissue. This form of tetany lasts for approximately 1 week. The second form encountered is that associated with chronic hypoparathyroidism due to excessive removal of parathyroid tissue. The treatment is dependent on the severity of the disorder and is outlined under the previous discussion of hypoparathyroidism. Finally, a refractory form of tetany may be observed in patients with hyperparathyroidism and severe skeletal changes. In this group calcium and phosphorus are constantly being withdrawn from the serum for recalcification of the markedly depleted bone. As a consequence the tetany may be severe and the low serum calcium is accompanied by a low serum phosphorus. In such patients there is a rough parallel between the initial height of the serum alkaline phosphatase and the severity of the subsequent postoperative tetany. The serum alkaline phosphatase rises during this period and may stay elevated until recalcification is completed, often a matter of many months or longer.

The treatment of acute postoperative tetany is essentially similar to that described elsewhere in this chapter for the treatment of hypoparathyroidism. This consists particularly of the repeated intravenous use of calcium salts and in addition injections of parathormone. Where the tetany is more persistent and prolonged dihydrotachysterol (AT 10) or vitamin D is substituted for parathormone since refractoriness to this hormone develops. Tetany associated with postoperative recalcification of the skeleton is apt to be both persistent and refractory despite the usual therapeutic measures. In such instances calcium must be vigorously administered through every available route in an attempt to provide adequate amounts of this ion both for skeletal repairs and for other physiologic base acidosis and an associated hyperchloremia. The skeletal changes of rickets are often demonstrable in this syndrome.<sup>10</sup>

Idiopathic hypercalcemia has been described in association with a previous or present history of a staphylococcal abscess pyelonephritis. This syndrome in which calcium phosphate or calcium oxalate kidney stones frequently occur is characterized by a considerable increase in the urinary excretion of calcium, a normal serum calcium level and some reduction in the serum phosphorus.<sup>11</sup> Hypercalcemia may also be encountered in the Fanconi syndrome. This syndrome consists essentially of vitamin D resistant rickets, lowered serum phosphorus, normal serum chloride, glycosuria, aminoaciduria and only rarely hyperphosphatemia. The urine will often show a considerable amount of albumin and it may be either neutral or alkaline in reaction with a high ammonium content. Chronic acidosis is frequently present. The hypophosphatemia and rickets are probably due to impairment in the tubular reabsorption of phosphorus. Patients with Fanconi syndrome commonly succumb to chronic renal failure or hepatic cirrhosis and on post mortem examination extensive cystine deposition in the internal organs is frequently encountered.<sup>12</sup>

Treatment of Primary Hyperparathyroidism—The treatment of primary hyperparathyroidism consists of the surgical removal of the underlying parathyroid adenoma or resection of sufficient parathyroid tissue in those instances due to diffuse hyperplasia.

Dietary therapy is of little value in the treatment of this disease. A high calcium diet will decrease the negative calcium balance and thereby spare the skeleton but will also serve to increase the urinary excretion of calcium and thus favor the development of renal complications. Since these renal manifestations are serious features of the illness a low calcium diet is preferable. Finally a high calcium diet will increase the hypercalcemia and the symptoms dependent on the elevated serum calcium level. A high phosphorus diet will raise the level of the serum inorganic phosphorus and depress the serum calcium concentration. However the increase in urinary excretion of phosphorus will favor precipitation of calcium phosphate. A low calcium and low phosphorus diet is therefore desirable while the patient awaits operation.

Some favorable results have been said to follow the use of x-ray therapy to the parathyroid bodies.<sup>13-15</sup> The evidence however is dubious and most observers doubt the efficacy of this form of treatment. This therapy should be avoided and surgery resorted to without any undue waste of time.

Before operation an attempt should be made by suitable x-ray studies to locate the site of a possible parathyroid tumor. Search should be particularly directed to the esophagus and mediastinum employing esophagrams and tomographic studies. In approximately 10 per cent of the cases such tumors may be located preoperatively.<sup>16</sup> Indeed with careful x-ray studies suggestive evidence of such tumors were demonstrated in 20 of 34 cases by Wyman and Robbins.<sup>17</sup> In these studies the actual tumors were usually not identified but suggestive indentation of the trachea or esophagus or both were found chiefly at the level of the 7th cervical to the 2nd dorsal vertebra. Surgical exploration is carried out bearing in mind that most tumors are from the inferior parathyroids. However if no tumor bones is much greater than in true rickets. These changes are best noted in the knees, wrists and ankles. In addition there is a moth-eaten appearance associated with decalcification and stippling noted in the skull. Whether the skeletal changes in this syndrome result from renal acidosis alone or are due actually to an increase in secretion of parathyroid hormone is a disputable point. The probable significance of the latter is suggested by the fact that the administration of parathormone to nephrectomized animals results in a degree of skeletal change considerably greater than that observed in untreated nephrectomized controls<sup>11</sup>. It is interesting to note that nephrectomized parathyroidectomized animals fail to develop skeletal changes<sup>12</sup>.

The clinical features of the disease are renal insufficiency with fixation of the specific gravity, an increase in the blood non protein and urea nitrogen levels, a decrease in the  $\text{CO}_2$  content of the blood, an elevation of the inorganic phosphorus of the serum and a normal or slightly reduced serum calcium level. The serum alkaline phosphatase is usually elevated. Calcium may be deposited about the joints in the skin and arteries and in the latter may produce Monckeberg's sclerosis.

The differentiation from primary hyperparathyroidism may at times be difficult since renal disease associated with this latter syndrome is often extensive enough to produce renal insufficiency in which case the serum inorganic phosphorus may rise and the serum calcium fall.

The treatment of secondary hyperparathyroidism is directed essentially towards control of the acidosis, the underlying renal disease if possible, and the symptoms referable to the skeletal changes. The regimen consists of a high calcium low phosphorus diet with added vitamin D. Alkaline salts such as sodium citrate given orally in a dosage of 8 grams a day will serve to correct the acidosis and to decrease the negative calcium balance. Similarly the oral administration of aluminum hydroxide will serve to precipitate phosphate in the intestinal tract as aluminum phosphate and thus permit some increase in the serum calcium level. On this regimen the skeletal changes may be considerably improved.

needs. Vitamin D is given to aid the absorption of calcium. The daily injection of 100 units of parathyroid hormone in 2 or 3 divided doses is later followed by the oral administration of dihydrotachysterol.

Secondary Hyperparathyroidism—Diffuse hyperplasia of the parathyroid glands may result from calcium deprivation, rickets and osteomalacia, biliary fistula, and chronic jaundice,<sup>69</sup> pregnancy and lactation, multiple myeloma and finally chronic diffuse glomerulonephritis or chronic pyelonephritis.<sup>70</sup> When this type of enlargement of the parathyroid glands is associated with skeletal changes similar to those seen in primary hyperparathyroidism the clinical syndrome is referred to as 'secondary hyperparathyroidism'. The parathyroid glands observed under such circumstances are histologically different from those seen in primary hyperparathyroidism.<sup>71</sup> In the former the glands are enlarged and are made up of all three cellular elements. In most instances however the chief cells are predominant although in some cases the water clear cells are more numerous. There is an absence of mitoses and a decrease in or absence of intercellular fat tissue. In addition the glycogen content of the cells is higher than is found either in adenoma or in primary hyperplasia of the parathyroids.<sup>72</sup> The usual size of the water clear cells in contrast to the large water-clear cells characteristic of primary hyperplasia renders the histological differentiation relatively simple.

The recognition of secondary hyperparathyroidism is of importance since in this condition no cure can be envisaged while in primary hyperparathyroidism surgical intervention may result in considerable improvement and often in cure. On the other hand instances of primary hyperparathyroidism resulting in renal disease and renal insufficiency followed by secondary hyperparathyroidism have been reported.<sup>73-75</sup>

The clinical syndrome of secondary hyperparathyroidism in contrast to simple secondary parathyroid hyperplasia is almost invariably associated with chronic renal insufficiency with acidosis. Under these circumstances the retention of organic and inorganic acids by the insufficient kidney results in phosphate retention and acidosis. Parathyroid hyperplasia then occurs as a result of the fall in serum calcium brought about by the rise in serum inorganic phosphorus. Associated with the parathyroid hyperplasia are skeletal changes. This entity is often referred to as renal hyperparathyroidism or renal rickets or renal osteodystrophy. When this syndrome occurs in the adult it is characterized by a generalized osteitis fibrosa which is identical with that observed in patients with primary hyperparathyroidism; however bone cysts and giant cell tumors are generally not seen. In children in addition epiphyseal changes are noted where no such changes are seen in primary hyperparathyroidism. These epiphyseal changes which on roentgenologic study resemble true rickets are histologically quite different.

In renal osteodystrophy in the child the roentgenograms may reveal large and deeply cupped metaphyses with a woolly appearance. The distal ends of the diaphyses show irregular metaphyseal margins and well defined epiphyses peripherally. Epiphyseal slipping frequently occurs because of the generalized decalcification and subperiosteal erosion of the metaphyses. In general the porous appearance and transparency of the

LABORATORY TESTS OF ENDOCRINE FUNCTION

Chloride in Serum<sup>1</sup>

Reagents

- 1 Mercuric nitrate solution
Dissolve 2.9 to 3.0 grams of mercuric nitrate (c.p. Baker's analyzed) in 200 ml distilled water
Add 20 ml 2N nitric acid
Dilute to 1000 ml with distilled water
- 2 Indicator—Diphenylcarbazone (Eastman Kodak #4459)
Dissolve 100 mg diphenylcarbazone in 100 ml ethyl alcohol and store in a dark bottle in the refrigerator
Prepare fresh each month
- 3 Standard sodium chloride solution
Dry sodium chloride (c.p.) in oven overnight at 120 °C
Dissolve 584.5 mg of sodium chloride in distilled water and dilute to 1000 ml
This solution contains 10 milliequivalents of Cl per liter
To standardize mercuric nitrate solution titrate 2 ml of the standard sodium chloride solution

Procedure

Pipette 0.2 ml serum in a 25 ml Erlenmeyer flask
Add 1.8 ml distilled water
4 drops of indicator
Add mercuric nitrate from a microburette calibrated in 0.01 ml interval (1 ml should equal about 100 drops)
The color of the mixture is a salmon red which changes to a deep violet when the end point has been reached
The removal of proteins intensifies the color change at the end point. However deproteinization is not essential

Calculation

$$\frac{\text{titer of unknown}}{\text{titer of standard}} \times 0.02 \times \frac{1000}{112} = \text{milliequivalents of Cl liter}$$

Normal values 98 to 110 milliequivalents/liter

Urinary Chloride

The method described above for the determination of serum chloride may be applied to urine

Sodium in Serum <sup>2</sup>

Reagents

- 1 Ashing mixture
  - 20 ml nitric acid (concentrated)
  - 5 ml sulfuric acid (concentrated)
  - 5 ml perchloric acid (70%)

- 2 Uranium zinc acetate reagent

Solution A

80 grams Na free uranium acetate  $\text{UO}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_3\text{O}_2)_2 \cdot 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$
 48 grams or 46 ml 30% acetic acid (% by volume)
 Add water to 520 grams

Solution B

220 grams zinc acetate  $\text{Zn}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_3\text{O}_2)_2 \cdot 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$
 24 grams or 23 ml 30% acetic acid
 Add water to 520 grams

Cover and warm both solutions on steam bath. Stir occasionally until solution is complete. Mix while hot.

Let stand 24 hours before using.

If no yellow precipitate appears add 0.2 gram of precipitated uranyl zinc sodium acetate to saturate solution.

Shake solution occasionally.

- 3 Ethyl alcohol 95% saturated with uranium sodium zinc acetate
- 4 Ethyl ether

Procedure

Pipette 1 ml serum into a 25 ml Erlenmeyer flask.

Add 4 ml ashing mixture.

Mix and heat carefully on a hotplate until one drop is left.

Cool and add 1 ml distilled water.

Mix thoroughly.

Add 10 ml freshly filtered uranium zinc acetate solution.

Mix thoroughly.

Add another 10 ml portion of the reagent and mix.

Let stand one hour.

From a desiccator take a clean dry fritted glass filter and weigh on an analytical balance.

Place filter on suction flask and transfer quantitatively the contents of the Erlenmeyer flask.

Wash the Erlenmeyer with a 6 ml portion of the uranium zinc acetate reagent and transfer this to the filter.

Wash filter with three 2 ml portions of freshly filtered alcohol saturated with uranyl sodium zinc acetate.

Wash three times with 2 ml portions of ethyl ether.

Dry with suction and place in desiccator over calcium chloride for  $\frac{1}{2}$  hour and then weigh.

Run blank on all reagents simultaneously.

Calculation

$$\frac{23}{1.538} \times 100 = 149$$

$$149 \times (\text{mg. of precipitate} - \text{mg. of blank}) = \text{mg. Na 100 ml}$$

$$\frac{23}{1535} \times \frac{1}{23} \times 1000 = 0.65$$

$0.65 \times (\text{mg. of precipitate} - \text{mg. of blank}) = \text{meq. of Na/liter}$
 Normal Values 137-142 meq/liter

Sodium in Urine<sup>4,5</sup>

Reagents

- 1 Uranium zinc acetate
- 2 Phenolphthalein—1% alcoholic solution
- 3 Powdered mercuric chloride
- 4 Powdered calcium hydroxide
- 5 Ethyl alcohol 95% saturated with uranium sodium zinc acetate
- 6 Ethyl ether

Procedure

Into a small Erlenmeyer flask measure roughly about 6 ml urine

Add 1 drop phenolphthalein and 0.2 gram powdered  $\text{Ca(OH)}_2$

Shake and let stand 30 minutes with occasional shaking. Solution should turn pink

If urine contains protein take about 10 ml urine and add 0.5 gram  $\text{HgCl}_2$  and then add  $\text{Ca(OH)}_2$

Filter through a fine paper and place a stopper in the test tube to avoid precipitation of  $\text{CaCO}_3$  by  $\text{CO}_2$  in atmosphere

If urine contains protein test filtrate: If protein is still present add more  $\text{HgCl}_2$  and refilter

Fit a solid rubber stopper from below into the bottom of a fritted glass filter which has been dried in a desiccator and weighed

Pipette approximately 20 ml of freshly filtered uranium zinc acetate reagent into filter

Pipette 2 ml urine filtrate directly into reagent in filter

Stir with a small glass rod until precipitate appears

Continue stirring for a few minutes thereafter

Withdraw stirring rod rinsing it with 3 to 5 ml of the reagent

Cover filter with watch glass and let stand 1 hour

The temperature of the room should be kept fairly constant

Remove stopper and place filter on a suction flask

After reagent has been filtered off wash twice with 5 ml portions of freshly filtered alcohol saturated with uranium sodium zinc acetate

Wash sides of filter carefully

Wash twice with 5 ml portions of ethyl ether

Dry with suction and place in desiccator over calcium chloride for  $\frac{1}{2}$  hour Weigh

Run a blank on all reagents simultaneously

Calculation

$$14.95 \times \frac{(\text{gram of precipitate} - \text{blank})}{V} = \text{grams of Na/l}$$

$$650 \times \frac{(\text{gram of precipitate} - \text{blank})}{V} = \text{meq/l of Na}$$

V = ml of urine in sample

Potassium in Serum<sup>2</sup>*Reagents

- 1 Sulfuric acid—4 normal
112 ml sulfuric acid diluted to 1000 ml with distilled water
- 2 Thorium nitrate ( $\text{Th}(\text{NO}_3)_4$ ) 10% 10 grams thorium nitrate dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 100 ml
- 3 Phosphoric acid ( $\text{H}_3\text{PO}_4$ )—0.1% 1 ml phosphoric acid—85% diluted to 850 ml with distilled water
- 4 Chloroplatinic acid ( $\text{H}_2\text{PtCl}_6 \cdot 6\text{H}_2\text{O}$ ) containing 10% platinum 26.5 grams of chloroplatinic acid dissolved in water and diluted to 100 ml
- 5 Absolute ethyl alcohol saturated with potassium chloroplatinate
Shake alcohol with a small quantity of the salt
- 6 10% potassium chloride saturated with potassium chloroplatinate
Shake potassium chloride with a small quantity of the salt
- 7 Potassium iodide (KI)—2 normal
33.2 grams potassium iodide dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 100 ml
- 8 Sodium thiosulfate ( $\text{Na}_2\text{S}_2\text{O}_3$ ) 0.01 normal
Dilute from 0.1% standardized against potassium bismodate

Apparatus

- Muffle furnace
- Platinum crucible
- Shohl microfilter

Drop a small glass bead into a funnel with a 1 inch diameter and make a mat of fine grained ash on top

Procedure

- Pipette 1 ml serum into a platinum crucible
- Add 2 drops 4N sulfuric acid
- Mix thoroughly
- Add 1 ml thorium nitrate
- Rotate crucible carefully in order to mix the contents completely
- Place on steam bath and evaporate to dryness
- When dry place crucible on outer door of muffle furnace (which has previously been heated to 750 °C) and slowly introduce it into the furnace
- Close door of furnace and ash for 10 minutes or until a snow white ash is obtained
- Add 1.0 ml of the phosphoric acid (0.1%) to the ash and mix thoroughly with a small glass rod
- Add a 1 ml portion of the phosphoric acid and again mix thoroughly
- Transfer this 6 ml to a 15 ml conical centrifuge tube and centrifuge
- Pipette a 5 ml aliquot into a 50 ml pyrex beaker
- Place on a steam bath and evaporate to dryness
- To beaker add
  - 0.3 ml chloroplatinic acid
  - 5.0 ml absolute alcohol
- Mix and let stand 20 minutes
- Place Shohl microfilter on a suction flask containing a test tube for collection of excess platinum solution (this may later be recovered)
- Transfer quantitatively to the Shohl filter the contents of the beaker
- Wash beaker with four 2 ml portions of freshly filtered absolute alcohol saturated with potassium chloroplatinate and pass through filter
- Release suction and replace catch tube
- Wash beaker with four 2 ml portions of freshly filtered potassium chloride saturated with potassium chloroplatinate and pass through filter

Remove filter funnel from suction flask and invert over the 50 ml beaker used previously.

Insert glass rod into stem of funnel and return filter to beaker

Wash funnel with 1 to 2 ml hot distilled water

Add 1 ml 2 normal potassium iodide and place on water bath at 60 °C for 15 minutes.

Titrate white till hot with 0.01 N thio sulfate from a microburette

End point is a lemon yellow color free from red

Run a blank on all reagents simultaneously

Calculation

$$\frac{10(1-13)}{1} = \text{mcg of } K_2I$$

$$\frac{39.1(A-B)}{V} \approx m_k \text{ of } k/100 \text{ ml}$$

1 ml of 0.01 thio sulfate used in titration of unknown

J = 1000

V = ml of unknown

Normal Values 3.5 to 4.5 meq liter

Potassium in Urine

Urine potassium may be determined by the same method used for serum

THE USE OF THL 11AM1L PHOTOVILTER FOR THE DETERMINATION OF SERUM AND URINARY SODIUM AND POTASSIUM

For the rapid determination of sodium and potassium flame photometer may be employed. Stock standard containing known concentrations of sodium chloride and potassium chloride are prepared and from these solution a curve is drawn

A solution of lithium chloride is also prepared for use as an internal standard. The light of the element to be determined is directly compared to the light emitted by the lithium.

stock standard

All chemicals used should be of the highest chemical purity.

1 Dry sodium chloride and potassium chloride in an oven at 110 °C for several hours before weighing.

Dissolve 14614 grams of sodium chloride and 18638 gram of potassium chloride in distilled water and dilute to 500 ml

This solution contains 25 mM of sodium and potassium respectively and is used for dilutions of less concentrated standard

2 Dissolve 10.624 grams of lithium chloride in distilled water and dilute to 1000 ml. This solution contains 2.0 m/l of lithium chloride.

Dilute the stock standard for working, tin(IV) containing, 10.08.06.0, 0.4.0.3.0.2 and 0.1 mM of sodium and potassium and 10 mM of lithium fluoride respectively.

A solution containing 10 mM of lithium chloride is also made to be used for adjusting the zero point of the machine.

Total and Bound Magnesium in Serum <sup>19</sup>

Reagents

1. Trichloroacetic acid—20%

20 grams trichloroacetic acid dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 100 ml

- 1 Sodium acetate—20% 20 grams sodium acetate dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 100 ml
- 3 Brom-cresol green
0.016% alcoholic solution
- 4 Ammonium hydroxide 1:1
Dilute 1 part ammonium hydroxide with 1 part distilled water
- 5 Ammonium hydroxide dilute
Dilute 1 part ammonium hydroxide with 50 part distilled water
- 6 Ammonium oxalate—saturated (about 4%)
- 7 Potassium dihydrogen phosphate—2%
Dissolve 2 grams potassium dihydrogen phosphate in distilled water and dilute to 100 ml
- 8 Ammonia alcohol wash solution
Dilute 200 ml 85% alcohol and 50 ml concentrated ammonium hydroxide to 1000 ml with distilled water
- 9 Stock standard
Dissolve 560 mg potassium dihydrogen phosphate in distilled water and dilute to 1000 ml
Store in refrigerator
For working standard dilute 10 times
1 ml of working standard is equivalent to 0.01 mg of magnesium
- 10 Stannous chloride stock solution—40%
Dissolve 11.9 grams  $\text{SnCl}_2 \cdot 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$  in 25 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid Dilute 200 times immediately before using
- 11 Sodium molybdate—7.5%
Dissolve 7.5 grams sodium molybdate in distilled water and dilute to 100 ml
- 12 Sulfuric acid—10 normal
982 ml concentrated sulfuric acid are diluted to 1000 ml with distilled water

Procedure

In a 15 ml conical centrifuge tube place

3 ml serum

9 ml distilled water

3 ml 20% trichloroacetic acid

Mix thoroughly and let stand one half hour

Centrifuge and filter supernatant fluid through a Whatman #43 filter paper

Into a clean 15 ml conical centrifuge tube put

10 ml filtrate

1 ml sodium acetate

1 ml ammonium oxalate

6-8 drops brom-cresol green

Mix with a stirring rod and adjust to pH 5.0 with the 1:1 ammonium hydroxide

Let stand overnight

Centrifuge and decant supernatant fluid into another 15 ml conical centrifuge tube

Wash precipitate once with a small amount of dilute ammonium hydroxide centrifuge and add wash to the original supernatant fluid

Add

1 ml potassium dihydrogen phosphate 2%

1 ml concentrated ammonium hydroxide

Stir well and let stand overnight

Centrifuge and decant supernatant fluid

Wash precipitate twice with ammonia alcohol wash solution

Centrifuge decant and place in drying oven at 90 to 95°C

Colorimetric assay

To dry precipitate add

1 ml 10 normal sulfuric acid

7 ml distilled water

Mix thoroughly and add

1 ml sodium molybdate

1 ml stannous chloride dilute

Mix and let stand at least 10 minutes and read in a photoelectric colorimeter using a blue filter with a maximal absorption at 420 mμ

Standard solutions containing 0.01 and 0.02 mg plus a blank of the reagents are run simultaneously

Calculation

$$\frac{\text{Reading of unknown}}{\text{Reading of standard}} \times \text{Conc of standard} \times \frac{100}{2} = \text{mg of Magnesium/100 ml serum}$$

Normal values for total magnesium vary between 2 and 3 mg/100 ml

For the determination of diffusible magnesium serum may be ultrafiltered through a #600 cellophane membrane according to the method described by Lavietes<sup>9</sup>

The magnesium content is determined as described above except that it is unnecessary to precipitate the proteins

In normal individuals the percentage of the total magnesium which is non diffusible or bound does not exceed 25%

Individuals with hyperthyroidism show a very marked increase in the percentage of bound magnesium, the latter varying between 25 and 62% of the total magnesium. In myxedema the percentage of bound magnesium varies from 0 to 10%

Calcium Balance<sup>10</sup>

Place patient on a diet containing 100 mg of calcium per day for 6 days

Collect 24 hour samples of urine for the last 3 days of the diet period

Pool and analyze for calcium

An excretion of 300 mg or less of calcium for the 3 day period is considered normal. In hyperparathyroidism considerably over 300 mg will be excreted

Sulkowitch Test for Urinary Calcium<sup>11</sup>*Reagent

- 2.5 grams of oxalic acid
- 5 grams of ammonium oxalate
- 50 ml. of glacial acetic acid
- Dilute to 150 ml. with distilled water

Procedure

Collect a 24 hour sample of urine and note volume

To a 5 ml. aliquot add 5 ml. of the reagent

Let stand 2 to 3 minutes

When calcium is present in the urine, a fine white precipitate is formed, indicating a normal blood calcium level

The absence of a precipitate indicates the absence of urinary calcium and a blood calcium level of less than 7.5 mg. %

The presence of a heavy precipitate indicates hypercalcemia

This test should not be performed after the ingestion of large amounts of fluid or after the ingestion of milk

Calcium Load Test<sup>5</sup>*Method

The patient is placed on a fixed diet for 2 successive days the total urine being collected for each day from 9.30 A.M. to 9.30 A.M. On the second day, approximately 1 hour after breakfast an intravenous infusion is given over a period of 4 hours. During this time 1 liter of normal saline containing 10 mg. of calcium per kilogram of body weight in the form of a salt (gluconate-glucoheptonate) is administered at a steady rate. The patient is allowed to eat lunch at the usual time during the infusion. Drinking water is allowed ad lib.

Results

In normal subjects there is a considerable reduction in the urinary excretion of phosphorus during the second (or test) day. In subjects with hyperparathyroidism there is little alteration in the urinary excretion of phosphorus whereas in patients with hypoparathyroidism there is a marked increase in urinary phosphorus noted on the test day.

Serum Precipitable Iodine<sup>1 12 51</sup>*Reagents Required

All solutions should be made up in double-distilled water. If the amount of iodide in the water is still too high to give a satisfactory blank, it may be necessary to carry out these distillations with such reagents as alkali and permanganate.

All reagents used should be of highest purity obtainable. However the iodine content in each instance must be judged from the blank values rather than from estimates shown on the labels. Often it is necessary to turn to a new source of supply or a different lot number in case of contamination.

Zinc Sulfate 100 grams of  $ZnSO_4 \cdot 7H_2O$  per liter of solution

Sodium Hydroxide 0.5 N is 20 grams of NaOH per liter of solution. The zinc sulfate and sodium hydroxide reagents should be so related that when 10.0 ml. of the former are diluted with 50-70 ml. of water and titrated with the latter 10.8-11.2 ml. of the 0.5 N NaOH are required to produce a faint permanent pink color with phenolphthalein.

Hydrochloric Acid 2 N 200 ml. C.P. concentrated HCl per liter of solution

Sulfuric Acid 7 N 196 ml C P concentrated  $H_2SO_4$  per liter of solution

Iodide Standards Either NaI or KI of highest purity desiccator-dried may be used. If NaI is chosen 118.1 mg. are dissolved in water and made to 1 l. if KI 130.8 mg. These concentrated stock solutions contain 100.0  $\mu$ gm I/ml.

A more dilute stock is obtained by diluting 2 ml. of the above solution to 1 l. To prepare the standard of 0.04  $\mu$ gm I/ml solution used in each determination 10 ml. of this dilute stock are further diluted to 50 ml.

All of these solutions have been found to keep indefinitely at refrigerator temperatures but it is preferable to make up the most dilute standard fresh every week or two.

Ceric Ammonium Sulfate 0.02 N 12.65 grams of the salt are dissolved in 500 ml. of water plus 230 ml. of 7 N  $H_2SO_4$ . When the solution is clear it is made to 1 l. with water.

Sodium Arsenite 0.1 N Dissolve 4.95 grams of  $As_2O_3$  in 20 ml. of 4% (1N) NaOH warming to hasten solution. This should be diluted with about 300 ml. of water and dilute sulfuric acid added until the solution is slightly acid to litmus paper (if the 7 N is used about 4 ml. will be required). The solution is then made to 1 liter. If sodium arsenite itself is used 10.0 grams of  $NaAsO_2$  should be dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 100 ml. No acid or alkali is required with this salt.

Procedure

The steps involved can most conveniently be described under four headings:

(1) precipitation and washing of plasma proteins (2) drying and incineration of sample (3) dissolving iodide from the ash (4) colorimetric determination of iodide present.

(1) Precipitation and washing of plasma proteins. The blood sample about 10 ml. is centrifuged and the plasma or serum drawn off. Duplicate aliquots of 1 ml. each are pipetted into 15 x 125 mm. Pyrex test tubes, diluted with 7 ml. of distilled water and 1.0 ml. of 10% zinc sulfate solution added. The contents of each tube are mixed with a glass stirring rod about 2 mm. in diameter. 1.0 ml. of 0.5 N sodium hydroxide is added and the solutions thoroughly mixed to insure even distribution of the alkali and complete precipitation of the proteins. Any material adhering to the rod can be removed by rubbing it with a rotary movement against the inside wall of the tube.

The tube and contents are centrifuged for 10 minutes to pack the precipitate and the supernatant fluid is poured off. Ten ml. of distilled water are added and the protein resuspended by means of the same stirring rod originally used. Stirring should be only sufficiently vigorous to distribute the zinc proteinate uniformly throughout the solution; if over zealously carried out the precipitate may be so finely divided that it cannot easily be centrifuged down. Centrifugation is again carried out and the supernatant discarded. This washing process is repeated two more times making a total of three washings (the original precipitation is not included as a washing).

(2) Drying and incineration. After the last supernatant solution has been poured off 0.8 ml. of 4.0 N sodium carbonate is added and thoroughly stirred into the precipitate with the same stirring rod used in the washings. Removal of material clinging to the rod can be accomplished by rubbing, as described previously, followed by 0.2 ml. of the 4.0 N  $Na_2CO_3$  added dropwise down the rod. This last portion of alkali can easily be mixed with the sludge already present without use of the stirring rod. The tube is then placed in an oven set at 85-90°C. to drive off water. This usually requires 12-18 hours and is usually carried out overnight.

After thorough drying of the alkali and zinc proteinate a lining is carried out by placing the tube in a muffle furnace for two and one-half hours at 600-625°C. At the end of that time the tube is removed and allowed to cool to room temperature.

(3) Dissolving iodide from the ash Two ml of 2 N hydrochloric acid are added with due caution to avoid excessive effervescence. A glass rod is used to mix any unreacted ash with the acid and 20 ml of 7 N sulfuric acid and 30 ml of water are added. The contents of the tube are stirred until the reaction appears to be finished, transferred to a clean tube and briefly centrifuged to pack the insoluble material.

(4) Determination of iodide For each tube a pair of colorimeter tubes is taken. To one of the pair is added 10 ml of distilled water containing  $0.04 \mu\text{gm}$  of iodine as sodium or potassium iodide and to the other is added 10 ml of water. A 30 ml aliquot of the supernatant in the sample tube is pipetted into each colorimeter tube and 0.5 ml of the sodium arsenite solution is added to each tube. Mixing should be carried out by some technique which avoids both loss of solution and contamination.

The colorimeter tubes are then placed in a well stirred constant temperature water bath maintained at  $39 \pm 0.1^\circ \text{C}$  for 10 minutes to come to temperature. The ceric ammonium sulfate solution should also be warmed in the bath. Since the actual determination of iodide is accomplished by measuring iodide catalysis of the rate of decolorization of yellow ceric ammonium sulfate by arsenious acid the times at which colorimeter readings are made must be definitely set up. One ml of the ceric solution must be added to each tube with adequate time allowance for reading the color change in the previous tube. This is accomplished in this laboratory by leaving a 30-second interval between tubes and by setting up a maximum of only 12 tubes in a single series. Colorimeter readings are then made at six and 12 minutes after adding the ceric sulfate solution to each tube. If 30 seconds is not adequate for making the reading more time must be allowed and fewer determinations done in any one series. Since the measurement depends entirely upon the decrease in amount of color the pipetting of the 10 ml of ceric solution must be highly accurate even though done rapidly. Mixing must again be rapid and thorough.

The Klett-Sumnerson readings (using blue filter No. 42) are plotted on semi log paper against the time in minutes. Ordinary graph paper is suitable for instruments giving readings in terms of per cent light transmission. The colorimeter setting at zero time is obtained for any given batch of reagents by quickly reading a reagent blank immediately after addition of the ceric sulfate. The lines describing the two reaction rates are drawn using the points for 6 and 12 minutes and then the horizontal line indicating times required to reach equal amounts of decolorization. The amount of iodide in the colorimeter tube without added iodide is calculated from the following equation obtained from similar triangles:

$$\mu\text{gm I in colorimeter tube} = \frac{0.04 \times t_2}{t_1 - t_2}$$

$t_1$  = time in minutes at intercept of the rate of decolorization in tube containing no extra iodide with the designated horizontal

$t_2$  = time in minute at intercept of the rate of decolorization in tube containing added iodide with the designated horizontal

The reagents used contain variable amounts of iodide and the total must be determined by blank analysis starting with the zinc sulfate and sodium hydroxide solutions and carried through the entire procedure including the washing with 10 ml of distilled water, addition of 1 ml of sodium carbonate, drying, a final treatment with hydrochloric and sulfuric acid and the final colorimetric assay on 3 ml aliquots just as with an unknown sample. The blank value calculated by the same formula shown previously has been 0.015  $\pm$  0.017  $\mu\text{gm}$  I/tube in this laboratory.

Since it is customary to express the values in terms of  $\mu\text{gm}/100\text{ ml}$  plasma, the complete calculation would follow:

$14\text{ m}\mu\text{I HI } \mu\text{gm}/100\text{ ml}$

$$= 100 \times (1\text{ m final aliquot} - \text{blank})$$

where the factor of 7.3 has been introduced to correct for the 3.0 ml aliquot taken for colorimetric evaluation from the 7.0 ml of acid supernatant from the ashed sample.

If so much iodide is present in the sample that decolorization is nearly complete in the second tube with 0.04  $\mu\text{gm}$  of added  $I^-$  the determination may be repeated using less than the 1.0 ml of plasma usually called for. Computation of the result must be adjusted as necessary to cover this change.

A value of 3.5 to 8.7% is considered normal.

A value above 8.7% is found in hyperthyroidism.

A value of less than 3.5% is found in hypothyroidism.

Urinary Neutral 17 Ketosteroids<sup>15, 16, 17, 18, 19</sup>

Reagents

- 1 Hydrochloric acid concentrated (HCl)
- 2 Stannous chloride ( $\text{SnCl}_2$ )
- 3 Carbon tetrachloride ( $\text{CCl}_4$ )
- 4 Ethyl ether
- 5 10% sodium hydrosulfite ( $\text{Na}_2\text{S}_2\text{O}_4$ ) in 1 N sodium hydroxide
10 grams sodium hydrosulfite diluted in 1 normal sodium hydroxide and diluted to 100 ml
- 6 1 normal sodium hydroxide ( $\text{NaOH}$ )
40 grams  $\text{NaOH}$  dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 1000 ml
- 7 0.5 normal hydrochloric acid
41 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid diluted to 1000 ml with distilled water
- 8 Glacial acetic acid ( $\text{CH}_3\text{COOH}$ )
- 9 Girard's reagent T
- 10 Sodium hydroxide 10%
10 grams sodium hydroxide dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 100 ml
- 11 Sulfuric acid concentrated ( $\text{H}_2\text{SO}_4$ )
- 12 Absolute ethyl alcohol
- 13 Ethyl alcohol 95%
- 14 Sodium hydroxide 2 normal
80 grams sodium hydroxide dissolved in water and diluted to 1000 ml
- 15 Meta-dinitrobenzene
11.6 mg/ml absolute alcohol. Store in brown bottle in refrigerator. This solution remains stable for 10 to 14 days.

To purify meta-dinitrobenzene

Dissolve 20 grams of extra pure meta-dinitrobenzene (M.P. 59–59.5) in 700 ml 95% ethyl alcohol.

Warm to 40° and add 100 ml 2 normal sodium hydroxide.

Cool after 5 minutes and add 2000 ml distilled water.

Collect precipitate in a Buchner funnel.

Wash thoroughly with water and dry with suction.

Recrystallize from 120 and 50 ml absolute alcohol.

The colorless needles thus obtained should have a melting point of 90.5 to 91°.

Mix a 1% alcoholic solution of meta-dinitrobenzene with an equal volume of 2 normal sodium hydroxide. This should remain colorless after an hour.

16 Potassium hydroxide (KOH) 2.5 normal alcoholic solution

Dissolve with the aid of mechanical stirring about 9 grams KOH in 30 ml absolute ethyl alcohol

Filter with suction through a hard filter paper (Whatman #50)

To check concentration titrate with 0.5 normal sulfuric acid, using methyl orange as an indicator and adjust with alcohol if necessary to bring the solution to the limits of 2.45 to 2.52 normal. Store in refrigerator. The solution is stable for 2 to 5 days.

17 Acetone

18 Digitonin 7 mg/ml

Make a mg/ml aqueous solution of digitonin. Let stand overnight and filter.

Concentrate to 7 mg/ml by evaporation on steam bath.

19 Benzene

Procedure

Collect a 24 hour urine specimen using 7 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid as a preservative.

Measure volume of urine and add 150 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid for each liter of urine.

Add 0.7 gram stannous chloride to prevent emulsion.

Heat to 80° over a flame and transfer to continuous extractor using carbon tetrachloride as a solvent.

Extract for 7 hours.

Distil carbon tetrachloride (this may be used again) and dissolve residue in 100 ml ethyl ether.

Transfer ether to a separatory funnel and

Wash twice with 25 ml portions  $\text{Na}_2\text{S}_2\text{O}_4$ —10% in 1 normal NaOH

0.5 normal HCl

3 times

distilled water

Evaporate ether to dryness on steam bath and dissolve residue in absolute alcohol, using 1 ml alcohol for each 100 ml of urine extracted.

This is the crude extract.

Colorimetric Determination

Clean all colorimetric tubes with a nitric and chromic acid mixture.

Into a series of colorimeter tubes

Measure carefully with a micropipette 0.1 and 0.2 ml of the crude extract (If less than 0.2 ml is used bring volume to 0.2 ml with absolute alcohol.)

Add 0.2 ml meta-dinitrobenzene solution

0.2 ml 2.5 normal KOH

Shake thoroughly

Prepare two blanks simultaneously using

0.2 ml absolute alcohol

0.2 ml meta-dinitrobenzene solution

0.2 ml 2.5 normal KOH

Place in water bath at 25° ± 0.2° in dark for 80 minutes

Remove from water bath and add 20 ml 95% ethyl alcohol

Read in a darkened room in a photoelectric colorimeter within 3 to 20 minutes using first a green filter #520 and then a blue filter #420. To one of the blanks add a volume of the crude extract equal to the volume used in the test sample and read in the colorimeter immediately. Subtract this reading from the reading of the unknown, to correct for the color of the extract.

The 17 ketosteroid content of the test substance is determined in terms of androsterone by reference to a calibration curve which has previously been constructed from measurements of known amounts of androsterone. If the reading obtained by the green filter is 1.5 times or more greater than that obtained by the blue filter the Girard separation is unnecessary.

Girard Separation

Pipette an aliquot portion of the crude extract into a 250 ml Erlenmeyer flask and evaporate to dryness on a steam bath.
 Add 0.5 ml glacial acetic acid
 200 mg Girard's reagent T
 Stopper with tin foil and heat on steam bath for 10 minutes.
 Cool and add 40 ml ice water
 3 ml NaOH, 10%
 Extract 4 times with 40 ml portions of ethyl ether
 Wash combined ether extracts 3 times with 20 ml portions of distilled water
 To original aqueous phase plus the water washings of the ether extracts add 1 ml  $\text{H}_2\text{SO}_4$  (concentrated)
 20 ml ethyl ether
 Let stand 2 hours or more
 Add 1 ml  $\text{H}_2\text{SO}_4$
 Extract 4 times with 40 ml portions of ethyl ether
 Combine ether extracts and evaporate to dryness on a steam bath.
 Dissolve residue in absolute ethyl alcohol to original volume of aliquot portion used and proceed with colorimetric determination.

Precipitation of Dehydroandrosterone

Into a 15 ml conical centrifuge tube pipette
 3 ml alcoholic extract
 1 ml acetone
 4 ml aqueous digitonin solution
 Shake and let stand stoppered overnight
 Centrifuge at 2000 r p m for 15 minutes
 Pipette an aliquot portion into a stoppered bottle and add 25 ml benzene
 Shake vigorously
 Allow a short period for partial separation of the aqueous benzene phase and then decant about four fifths of the supernatant fluid through a soft filter paper
 Pipette 20 ml of this into a distilling flask and evaporate to dryness on a steam bath with the partial aid of a vacuum
 Add 20 ml ethyl ether and again evaporate to dryness
 Dissolve residue in a measured amount of absolute ethyl ether and determine colorimetrically

Procedure

Preparation of urinary extracts

For urines containing a normal or low titer of glyconemic activity a complete 48 hour specimen is necessary for assay

For urines containing a high titer a 24 hour specimen is sufficient

The urine is adjusted to pH 1.0 with hydrochloric or sulfuric acid and extracted 3 or 4 times with ethylene dichloride. Chloroform may also be used. If any emulsions are formed they may be broken by centrifugation or by allowing the mixture to stand for an hour.

The clear ethylene dichloride extract is evaporated almost to dryness under reduced pressure the temperature of the water bath not exceeding 50° C.

The residue is taken up in 30 ml of chloroform and the chloroform is extracted 3 times with 5 ml of cold 0.1 normal sodium hydroxide and 3 times with water. These washings are reextracted with chloroform.

The combined chloroform is evaporated down to a volume of approximately 1 to 2 ml and is transferred to a test tube with small amounts of chloroform. The test tube is placed in a water bath at 50° C and the remainder of the chloroform is evaporated under a stream of nitrogen. The dry residue is stored in the cold until ready for assay.

Preparation of extract for assay

6 to 8 mice are used for each assay. For normal male urine the equivalent of six hours of urine is administered to each mouse whereas for normal female urine or urines expected to be low in glycogen activity the equivalent of eight hours of urine is given to each animal.

The following will illustrate the manner in which the residue is prepared for assay so that the final extract will contain 10% alcohol plus the required amount of glucose which is approximately 70 mgm per mouse. The addition of this amount of glucose aids in sharpening the sensitivity of the test. For example the residue obtained from a 48 hour urine specimen is to be assayed on eight mice. Each mouse receives seven injections of 0.2 ml so that the final extract is made up to  $7 \times 0.2 \times 8 = 11.2$  ml and should contain  $70 \times 8 = 560$  mg of glucose. A 10% glucose solution is accurately prepared and 5.6 ml of this solution is measured into a 15 ml graduated tube.

The urine residue is dissolved in 1.12 ml of alcohol and this solution is run slowly drop by drop from a pipette into the 10% glucose solution the tube being shaken continuously during the addition of this material. The original tubes are rinsed out with water which is added to the extract and the final volume is made up to 11.2 ml with water. The extracts may be kept for 24 to 48 hours at ice box temperature.

Method

Male white mice weighing 20 to 25 grams are used. As the response to adrenal cortical extracts may vary with different strains of mice it is important to keep to the same strain.

Two days before adrenalectomy the mice are removed from their stock fare and placed on the McCollum lactation diet which contains 26% protein and 52% carbohydrate.

The animals are anesthetized with nembutal or ether and are bilaterally adrenalectomized by the usual lumbar route.

Following adrenalectomy they are placed in a constant temperature room or box at 76° C and are maintained on the McCollum diet. 0.9% NaCl containing 5% glucose is given as drinking water on the first postoperative day and 0.9% NaCl is substituted throughout the remainder of the test. The giving of glucose immediately following adrenalectomy almost completely eliminates the mortality due to operative shock.

On the third postoperative day food is removed at 5 P.M. and the mice are fasted until the following morning at which time the drinking water is also removed.

On the fourth postoperative day beginning at 9 A.M. a total of 7 injections are given at 9.15 A.M., 10 A.M., 10.45 A.M., 11.30 A.M., 12.30 P.M., 1.30 P.M. and 2.30 P.M. The material to be tested is taken into solution in 5% glucose and 10% alcohol. Two-tenths ml are given subcutaneously for each injection containing 70 mg of glucose.

At 3.30 P.M. the mice are weighed and anesthetized with sodium amytal (0.2 ml of a 1.8% solution). The livers are quickly removed and plunged into 4 ml of hot 50% KOH contained in a 15 ml graduated centrifuge tube.

The tubes are heated in a boiling water bath and frequently shaken until all the tissue is in solution.

Procedure

Preparation of urinary extracts

For urines containing a normal or low titer of glyconic activity a complete 48 hour specimen is necessary for assay

For urines containing a high titer a 24 hour specimen is sufficient

The urine is adjusted to pH 1.0 with hydrochloric or sulfuric acid and extracted 3 or 4 times with ethylene dichloride. Chloroform may also be used. If any emulsions are formed they may be broken by centrifugation or by allowing the mixture to stand for an hour.

The clear ethylene dichloride extract is evaporated almost to dryness under reduced pressure the temperature of the water bath not exceeding 50°C.

The residue is taken up in 30 ml of chloroform and the chloroform is extracted 3 times with 5 ml of cold 0.1 normal sodium hydroxide and 3 times with water.

These washings are reextracted with chloroform.

Procedure

Take a 200 ml aliquot and bring it to pH 1.0 by the addition of 20 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid

Transfer to a separatory funnel

Add 100 ml chloroform and shake hard for 5 minutes

Let stand until there is a complete separation of the urine and chloroform and draw off the chloroform layer into a 500 ml Erlenmeyer flask

Add 3 more 100 ml lots of chloroform shaking 5 minutes each time

Allow the pooled chloroform extracts to stand until any urine that has been dissolved in it rises to the top. Siphon off the layer of urine

Add sodium sulfate to the pooled chloroform extracts. Mix cover and allow to stand until the emulsion has been broken

Filter through a Whatman #5 filter paper

Chill the clear extract and wash

Twice with 0.1 its volume of 0.1 normal sodium hydroxide

Once 0.1 ' ' distilled water

Back wash each time with an equal volume of chloroform

Transfer washed chloroform extract to a distilling flask and evaporate under vacuum at a temperature not exceeding 50°. When the extract has distilled down to about 10 ml transfer it quantitatively to a 125 ml standard taper Erlenmeyer flask and take it to complete dryness under vacuum

This dry residue is stable at room temperature

Assay

On the night before the assay is to be done dissolve the dry residue in 3 ml glacial acetic acid

Two aliquots of the glacial acetic acid extract are taken for assay: one sample is treated with the periodic acid reagent to form formaldehyde. This is called the oxidized sample. In the second sample the reaction is prevented by the addition of the stannous chloride reagent prior to the periodic acid reagent. This is known as the unoxidized sample. A blank of all the reagents is also run simultaneously and is treated in the same manner as the unoxidized sample

Oxidized Sample	Unoxidized Sample	Reagent Blank
In a 50 ml boiling flask	In a 50 ml boiling flask	In a 50 ml boiling flask
0.5 ml acetic acid extract	0.5 ml acetic acid extract	0.5 ml glacial acetic acid
8.5 ml distilled water	8.5 ml distilled water	8.5 ml distilled water
0.5 ml periodic acid reagent	0.5 ml stannous chloride	0.5 ml stannous chloride
Let it stand at room temperature for exactly 30 minutes. Then arrest oxidation by the addition of 0.5 ml stannous chloride reagent	Mix thoroughly 0.5 ml periodic acid reagent	Mix thoroughly 0.5 ml periodic acid reagent

Distillation

The outlet of the still is placed under the meniscus of 10 ml distilled water in a 10 ml volumetric flask

The reagent blank, oxidized and unoxidized samples are then boiled over a microflame until approximately 8 ml of distillate are collected. These distillates are then diluted to the 10 ml volume with distilled water acid reagent with ethanol to the other is added 1 ml of blank reagent. After capping the tubes are shaken vigorously for 15 seconds and centrifuged. The chloroform layer is carefully removed by means of a 5- to 6-inch blunt needle connected to an aspirator and discarded (or the supernatant reagent layer is transferred to another tube).

Color Development—After standing at room temperature overnight or heating to 60 °C for 30 minutes, 0.5 to 0.8 ml of the sample is placed in a micro cuvette and optical density is compared at 410 mμ with that of an appropriate blank. After cleaning the cuvette the sample without phenylthiohydrazine is placed in the same cuvette in the same position and compared with a blank.

Standards—From 0.1 to 1.5 ml of the stock standard is diluted with water to a total of 10 ml in 2 centrifuge tubes and carried through the same procedure as that for the urine sample.

Determination of Chloroform soluble Plus Glucuronide 17 hydroxycorticosteroids in Human Urine

Hydrolysis of Glucuronides—0.5 or 1.0 ml of urine adjusted to approximately pH 6.5 is mixed with 4 volumes of glucuronidase solution (250 i.u. units per ml). The volume is adjusted to 5 ml with phosphate buffer pH 6.5 and the mixture is placed in a water bath at 37 °C for at least 2 hours. An alternative procedure is to add an equal volume of more dilute glucuronidase solution (25 i.u. units per ml) and to incubate at 37 °C for 18 hours or more.

Determination of Steroid—The sample and aqueous standard, adjusted to 5 ml with distilled water or buffer are shaken for 15 seconds with 25 ml of chloroform. Thereafter the procedure is identical with that described for the determination of free steroid except that two 10 ml aliquots of the chloroform extract are used instead of two 20 ml aliquots.

Normal range Average value is 6.6 mg = 3.7 mg in 24 hour urine

Determination of Chloroform soluble 17 hydroxycorticosteroids in Plasma

To each 10 ml sample of plasma are added 5 γ of hydrocortisone in aqueous solution. As standard known quantities of hydrocortisone in 1 ml of water are added to 10-ml portions of plasma which have been washed twice with 3 volumes of chloroform. The samples and standards are shaken with 25 or 50 ml of chloroform for 15 seconds. After the extraction the procedure is the same as that described for the analysis of urine.

The addition of hydrocortisone to the samples is not essential particularly if they contain more than 10 γ per cent of hydrocortisone or if smaller cuvettes are available.

Normal range The average steroid concentration in normal human plasma varies from 6 to 25 γ per cent expressed as hydrocortisone.

The Pituitary Corticotropin Eosinophil Test for Adrenal Cortical Insufficiency<sup>27</sup>

Procedure

No food is permitted after 8 P.M. On the following day an eosinophile count is done on the blood at 8 A.M. Immediately thereafter 25 mμ of corticotrophin is injected intramuscularly.

An eosinophile count is again done at 12 noon and the per cent decrease of circulating eosinophiles is determined.

The Intravenous ACTH Test<sup>28</sup>

Following the collection of a 24 hour urine specimen for 17 keto steroids and 17 hydroxycorticoid, 25 USP unit of ACTH dissolved in 500 ml of normal

Colorimetric Assay

In a Klett colorimeter tube place

3 ml. distillate

1 ml. chromotropic acid reagent

Mix thoroughly and place in a boiling water bath for exactly 30 minutes

Cool rapidly to 25° and make up to 10 ml. with 9 molar sulfuric acid

Mix cool and read in Klett-Summerson photoelectric colorimeter at 570 mμ

Subtract the reading of the unoxidized sample from that of the oxidized and refer to a calibration curve prepared from the oxidation and colorimetry of desoxy corticosterone dissolved in glacial acetic acid

Normal range 1 to 2 mg./24 hours urine volume

Urinary 17, 21 Dihydroxy 20 ketosteroids<sup>18</sup>*Reagents

1 Chloroform (reagent Merck)

2 0.1 N Sodium hydroxide

3 Phenylhydrazine hydrochloride recrystallized from ethanol and dried over calcium chloride

4 Sulfuric acid 190 ml. of water plus 310 ml. of concentrated acid (reagent Merck)

5 Blank reagent 100 ml. of dilute sulfuric acid mixed with 50 ml. of absolute ethanol

6 Phenylhydrazine-sulfuric acid reagent with ethanol 6g. m<sub>g</sub>. of phenylhydrazine hydrochloride dissolved in 150 ml. of blank reagent

7 B Glucuronidase solution 250 sigma units per ml. of M/15 phosphate buffer at pH 6.5 (incubation for 2 to 3 hours) or 25 sigma units per ml. of buffer (incubation for 18 to 24 hours)

8 Hydrocortisone standard 20 gamma per ml. 20 m<sub>g</sub>. of powdered hydrocortisone (free alcohol not the acetate) dissolved in 1 liter of distilled water or in 5 ml. of ethanol and diluted to 1 liter with water

Equipment

1 Test tubes<sup>1</sup> heavy wall 25 to 30 ml. capacity about 6 inches by  $\frac{3}{16}$  inch to which plastic caps can be fitted

3 Micro cuvette<sup>3</sup> for the Beckman model DU spectrophotometer silica cell 50 × 3 × 10 mm. light path about 0.8 ml. capacity with diaphragm attachment

Procedure : Determination of chloroform soluble urinary 17 hydroxycorticosteroids

Extraction—5 ml. of filtered urine and 25 ml. of chloroform are placed in each of 2 centrifuge tubes plastic caps are inserted and the tubes are shaken vigorously for 15 seconds. The chloroform extracts are combined before or after centrifugation and the aqueous phase is discarded

Washing—2 ml. of 0.1 N sodium hydroxide are added the caps are replaced and the tubes are shaken for about 10 seconds. After brief centrifugation the alkaline wash is discarded

Extraction by Reagent—20 ml. aliquots of the chloroform extract are placed in each of 2 test tubes. To one tube is added 1 ml. of phenylhydrazine-sulfuric flow per minute. After 2 control 15-minute periods provided the urine flow exceeds 5 ml per minute 2.5 per cent sodium chloride is given intravenously at the rate of 0.25 ml per kilo per minute for 45 minutes. If no decrease in urine flow ensues during the infusion or in two 15 minute periods thereafter 0.1 unit of pitressin is then injected intravenously and the effect observed. In this way if no inhibition of water diuresis by the hypertonic saline is noted the responsiveness to pitressin is demonstrated in order to prove that posterior pituitary hormone has not been secreted. In normal individuals and in patients with hysterical polydipsia there occurs a decrease in the urinary volume during and following the administration of the hypertonic saline. In patients with diabetes insipidus no such inhibition of urine flow occurs with the saline but does take place when the pitressin is administered.

Water Tolerance Test *

The day before the test the patient is maintained on a regular diet from which extra salt is omitted. After the evening meal at 6 P.M. no further food or drink is permitted except that indicated as part of the test. At 10.30 A.M. the patient is asked to void and the urine is discarded. All urine voided from this point until 7.30 the following morning is collected, measured and saved for chemical analysis. At 8.30 A.M. the patient again voids and the urine is discarded. He is then given 20 ml of water per kilogram of body weight over a 45 minute period. He again voids at 9.30, 10.30, 11.30 A.M. and at 12.30 P.M. Each specimen is collected and measured. At 11.30 A.M. blood is withdrawn under oil for chemical analysis. If the volume of any single specimen voided during the morning is greater than the total volume of urine voided during the night such a response indicates the absence of Addison's disease. If on the other hand the volume of the largest hourly morning specimen is less than that of the night urine Addison's disease may or may not be present and the second half of the procedure is then performed as follows.

The plasma collected above is analyzed for urea and chloride and similar determinations are performed on the nocturnal urine specimen.

The following formula is then used to compute the result

$$A = \frac{\text{Urea in urine (mg \%)} \times \text{Chlorides in plasma (mg \%)}}{\text{Urea in plasma (mg \%)} \times \text{Chlorides in urine (mg \%)}} \times \frac{\text{Volume of day urine (largest hourly specimen ml)}}{\text{Volume of night urine (total ml)}}$$

If the value of A in this equation is greater than 30 the patient probably does not have Addison's disease.

If the value of A' is less than 25 the patient probably has Addison's disease provided that nephritis has been excluded.

Water Loading Test<sup>17</sup>

The patient is fasted overnight and the following morning at 8.00 A.M. he voids and the urine is discarded. Fifteen hundred ml of tap water are administered orally over a 15- to 30-minute period and the urine is collected over a 2-hour period from the beginning of the test and the total volume measured. Under the circumstances of the test normal subjects excrete 1000 ml or more of urine while patients with hypopituitarism and adrenal insufficiency and patients with Addison's disease excrete less than 500 ml. Failure of adequate diuresis may be encountered in hepatic and renal disease, myxedema and dehydration. The significance of the test may be sharpened by noting the effect of cortisone on the diuresis. In patients with adrenal insufficiency the oral administration of 50 mgs of cortisone 2 hours saline is administered by intravenous drip over an 8 hour period on 2 successive days. Blood is drawn for eosinophil counts immediately before and 8 to 10 hours after the beginning of the first infusion. A 24 hour urine specimen is again collected beginning on the morning of the second ACTH infusion and including the period of this infusion. The urine is analyzed for steroids.

Results. In individuals without impairment of adrenal cortical function there occurs an 80 per cent or more fall in the blood eosinophil count following the first ACTH infusion. In patients with Addison's disease the reduction in eosinophiles under the circumstances of this test is 30 per cent or less. The increase in the urinary excretion of the neutral 17 ketosteroids following the second day's infusion of ACTH in subjects without adrenal cortical disease is usually in excess of 4 mg. with a correspondingly significant increase in the 17 hydroxycorticoid. In patients with Addison's disease only a negligible rise in the urinary excretion of both groups of steroids occurs.

In those instances in which the intravenous infusion of ACTH is not feasible the test may be performed by the intramuscular administration of 25 USP units every 4 hours for 72 hours with a urine collection over the last 24 hours.

The following technique is used for direct eosinophil counts.

The special diluting fluid used consists of

1% eosin	5 ml
Acetone	5 ml
Distilled water to	100 ml

The diluent is filtered before use. Oxalated blood is drawn into a white count pipette up to the 1 mark and the special diluting fluid is then used in the usual fashion. The pipette is shaken and the counting chamber is filled immediately.

The eosinophils which stand out as red dots are counted after 3 minutes.

The average of 4 chambers is computed.

Alternate Diluting Fluid

Stock Solutions

A 0.1% methylene blue in propylene glycol

B 0.1% phloxine in propylene glycol

Working Solutions

Mix { Dilute 2cc solution A with 2cc distilled water

{ Dilute 2cc solution B with 2cc distilled water

Allow pipette containing diluted blood to stand at least 15 minutes before counting.

The advantages of this method are that the eosinophil count need not be carried out at once and that a simultaneous total white blood cell count can be made.

Interpretation

Patients with Addison's disease show little or no drop in the eosinophil count while in normal subjects there occurs a 70% or more reduction in eosinophil. A 50% reduction is considered the lower limit of normal.

Hypertonic Saline Test for Diabetes Insipidus***

Method

All antidiuretic therapy is stopped in order to permit a recurrence of symptoms. Fluid is withheld for 8 hours prior to the onset of the test. Food however is permitted. The patient is hydrated by the oral administration of 20 ml of water per kilo of body weight over a period of one hour. Thirty minutes later a catheter is inserted and urine is collected in 15 minute periods and recorded as ml of urine.

Subtract the total sodium and chloride ions of sample A from sample B and divide this figure by 171 (meq in 10 grams of salt injected) for the per cent of excreted ions  $\epsilon$  ■

Sample A (6-9)

$171 \times 7 = 1197$

$171 \times 106 = 18126$

Calculate samples A and B of the second day's experiment in the same manner. For interpretation of the results compare the percentages of the first experiment with those of the second.

Normal individuals show a considerable increase in the percentage of salt retained after the injection of desoxycorticosterone acetate while patient with Cushing's syndrome show a sodium and chloride diuresis.

Retrorectal (Presacral) Gas Insufflation<sup>17</sup>

Method

After suitable preparation of the perianal region the administration of a cleansing enema or suitable cathartic the patient is placed in the knee-chest position in bed or on a table. The perianal skin and sacrococcygeal area are painted with an antiseptic solution and draped with sterile towel. The index finger of one hand is gently inserted into the rectum and the position of the coccyx determined. Immediately lateral to the inferior most coccygeal segment a skin wheal is raised with procaine and local anesthesia is then carried deeply in front of the coccyx. Palpation with the rectal finger guides the positioning of the infiltrating needle at all times. When anesthesia has been accomplished (usually not more than 1 ml will be required) the infiltrating needle is withdrawn. For the injection of the gas an 18 or 20 gauge 3 inch standard short bevel spinal needle fitted with an obturator is used. This is introduced along the anesthetized tract until the tip is felt through the rectal wall. To conform to the inclination of the rectum and sacrum the hub of the needle is depressed and the tip is advanced under constant digital guidance until it comes to lie in the mid line opposite the lower segments of the sacrum. It will seldom be necessary to advance the needle more than 2 inches from the skin to accomplish this. The obturator is removed and the conventional tests are made to ascertain that the needle tip does not lie within a blood vessel lumen. It is unnecessary to secure the needle in any way as it will not be moved if reasonable care is employed.

A standard pneumothorax gas measuring device filled with oxygen is used as the gas source. This is led to one limb of a three-way stopcock (Popper and Sons Inc. N.Y.). The other limbs are connected to the needle and to a standard 50 ml lock syringe. Hose end lock connections and pressure tubing are used throughout to prevent gas leaks and separation of the connection. A short length of pressure tubing is placed between the injection syringe and the needle to permit some degree of mobility during the injection. Oxygen is injected in 50-ml increments. Considerable pressure is required for the first 100-200 ml but thereafter practically no resistance is felt. In adults approximately 1250-1750 ml are administered over a 5-minute period. Almost all patients experience mild transitory abdominal cramps following the introduction of several hundred cubic centimeters of gas. The patients are closely watched for any evidence of gas embolization.

Following completion of the injection the needle is withdrawn. The patient is placed in a sitting position for 5 to 10 minutes to allow distribution of the gas and before drinking, the water load will result in a considerable increase in the urinary output over the 5-hour period

Salt Deprivation Tests

Harrop, Weinstein, Soffer and Trescher<sup>25</sup>

The patient is given a salt free diet, that is one containing less than 0.7 gram of sodium daily. Control samples of blood are analyzed for sodium, chlorides, potassium, urea nitrogen and hematocrit. A 24 hour control urine specimen is obtained and the sodium content determined. The patient is kept on this diet for 48 to 96 hours and the above data is repeated daily. On such a diet the patient with Addison's disease behaves in a characteristic fashion. There occurs an increase in the excretion of urinary sodium in excess of the intake, a progressive and definite fall in serum sodium and chlorides, an increase in the blood urea nitrogen and serum potassium and an increase in the hematocrit. This definite sequence of events is observed to occur only in Addison's disease. Normal individuals and patients with other illnesses can be kept for prolonged periods of time on a salt free diet without manifesting any of the typical changes seen in patients with destructive lesions of the adrenal cortex.

Actually it is not necessary to do the multitude of determinations outlined above as a provocative test. The demonstration of an increase in the excretion of urinary sodium above the intake or a definite fall in the level of the serum sodium renders the diagnosis of Addison's disease conclusive.

The test however is not without hazard since the patient with Addison's disease may be precipitated into a state of crisis upon the prolonged withdrawal of salt. The test therefore should only be performed in the hospital. The patient must be carefully observed and an adequate amount of adrenal steroid and intravenous salt must be immediately available for use if indicated.

Cutler, Power and Wilder Modification<sup>26, 27</sup>

The patient is given a diet with a standard amount of sodium chloride and potassium. In addition potassium citrate and water are administered in proportion to the body weight. The test is terminated after a 52 hour period and the urine voided during the last 4 hour period is analyzed for its concentration of chlorides. Under the circumstances patients with adrenal cortical insufficiency excrete urine with a high concentration of chlorides.

This test differs from the original salt deprivation test only in that the concentration of chlorides rather than that of sodium is determined in the urine. The patient is of course subjected to the same hazards.

Salt Tolerance Test<sup>28</sup>

Procedure

Patients are permitted no fluid after 7 P.M. of the night previous to the test.

At 6 A.M. of the morning of the test the patient voids and the urine is discarded. The patient is then given 500 ml. of water to drink at one time.

All urine from 6 A.M. to 9 A.M. is then collected as one sample. (Call this sample A.)

At 9 A.M. 200 ml. of 0.9% saline is injected intravenously and all urines from 9 A.M. to 12 M. are collected as a second sample. (Call this sample B.)

Two days later the procedure is repeated with the addition that on the evening previous to the test the patient is injected intramuscularly with 10 mg. of desoxy corticosterone acetate.

The volume of each urine sample is carefully noted and both sodium and chlorides are determined in terms of milliequivalents per volume.

For each hundred ml of urine used add 5 ml of the kaolin suspension and shake thoroughly. Allow the kaolin to settle out (One hour is usually sufficient although the mixture may be stored in the refrigerator overnight.)

Decant the supernatant liquid and collect the sediment in a large centrifuge bottle. Centrifuge and discard the supernatant liquid.

Add water to the kaolin and suspend it by vigorous shaking. Centrifuge and discard the supernatant fluid. Repeat this procedure once or twice until the kaolin has been washed free of urine.

Elute the hormone from the kaolin by adding a volume of normal ammonium hydroxide equal to that of the kaolin suspension originally added to the urine. Stir thoroughly until the suspension is homogeneous and allow to stand 20 to 30 minutes.

Centrifuge and save the supernatant liquid. Wash the kaolin once again with ammonium hydroxide. Centrifuge and add the supernatant fluid to the first eluate. Add glacial acetic acid to the combined eluates to bring the pH to 5.0. If a precipitate forms, centrifuge and save the supernatant fluid.

Bring the clarified supernatant fluid to pH 5.0 by the addition of acetic acid slowly and with constant stirring, add four volumes of ethanol for each volume of ammonium hydroxide to the eluate in order to precipitate the hormone. Place in refrigerator until thoroughly chilled. Centrifuge and dry the precipitate in a gentle stream of air or in a vacuum desiccator. This precipitate is stable at room temperature.

Assay

With a heavy stirring rod grind dry precipitate to a fine powder and add 10 ml distilled water for normal or high level and 10 ml distilled water for lower levels. Mix well.

Centrifuge and transfer supernatant fluid containing the gonadotropins to a small vial. A small precipitate may remain insoluble in the water but since it contains no gonadotropins it should be discarded. The extract should be stored in the refrigerator.

Immature female mice weighing between 6 and 10 grams are used for the assay. Each mouse receives a subcutaneous injection over a period of 3 days: 2 on each of the first 2 days (at 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.) and 1 on the third. The mice are then killed with chloroform 72 hours after the first injection. The uterus is removed, trimmed of attached connective tissue, pressed between layers of filter paper to remove fluid and weighed immediately on an analytical or fine torsion balance.

In order to make a rough titration of the urinary extract it is wise to divide the mice into 3 groups: one group of 3 mice receiving a total of 20 cc of extract (i.e. 5 injections of 0.4 ml per injection), another to receive a total of 10 ml and a third to receive a total of 0.5 ml.

Untreated controls are run simultaneously with each test case.

If the uterus of at least 2 mice of the 3 in 1 group weigh 10 mg or over the test is considered positive at that level.

Calculation

$$\frac{\text{Total vol of urinary extract}}{\text{Total vol of urinary extract injected}} \times \frac{24 \text{ hour urine vol}}{\text{Aliquot of urine used}} = \text{Mouse uterine units 24 hrs}$$

Normal Values: 5 to 10 mouse uterine units per 24 hours

Perirenal Insufflation<sup>20, 21</sup>

Method

The patient is placed on the side in the typical position for exposure of the kidney, with 2 or 3 small sandbags under the loins so as to increase the space between the twelfth rib and the iliac crest. The patient is rotated somewhat forward so as to allow the peritoneal contents to fall away as much as possible from the site of injection. The twelfth rib and the outer edge of the erector spinal muscles are outlined with tincture of mercurochrome. An acute angle is thus formed by the junction of these two lines. The skin is then prepared with tincture of iodine as for any operative procedure. The mercurochrome lines will stand out prominently under the iodine coating. A small amount of procaine hydrochloride is injected at the angle. An ordinary spinal tap needle is introduced in a direction pointing slightly upward toward the twelfth rib and somewhat forward and away from the erector spinal muscles. The needle is introduced until Gerota's fascia has been pierced. A definite sensation of perforation of this membrane is usually experienced. Aspiration at this level is made so as to be sure that the needle does not lie in a vessel. The needle is then attached to the oxygen delivery system which consists of a two bottle calibrated pneumothorax outfit and two glass attachments for washing and filtering the oxygen. Oxygen is delivered doubly filtered through cotton and washed by 1 to 500 mercury bichloride solution under 6 to 8 inches of gravity pressure. If the proper plane has been entered the oxygen will bubble freely under this small amount of head pressure. From 250 to 900 ml of oxygen is employed for visualization depending on the size of the patient and the size of the perirenal space. The average amount usually employed is approximately 500 ml.

The needle is removed after the introduction of the oxygen and the puncture site is coated with collodion. The patient is then asked to sit up and perform rowing exercises for about 10 minutes. This measure places the oxygen about the kidney and under the diaphragm. When flexion exercises are not feasible, manual massage over the kidney may be employed with similar results. A ray film is then taken in the antero-posterior and the oblique positions. The plate taken in the oblique position has usually given the better visualization. Roentgenograms taken in the lateral position are of the least benefit since the spine interferes in this plane.

Urinary Gonadotropins<sup>2, 22</sup>

Collect and store in a cool place a 24 hour sample of urine. Start to test within at most 6 hours after completion of sample.

Note volume and take an aliquot for testing.

To determine aliquot use

Entire sample for 5 mouse uterine units (m.u.)
$\frac{1}{2}$	10
$\frac{1}{4}$	20

If very high titers are to be anticipated an even smaller aliquot may be used.

Prepare a 20% suspension of kaolin (N.F.) powder that has previously been washed first with a solution of normal hydrochloric acid and then with distilled water. This solution is stable. Shake thoroughly before use.

Acidify the aliquot of the urine to be used with glacial acetic acid to pH 4.5 and pass it through a coarse filter paper or centrifuge to remove particulate matter.

Normal Value

In normal women during the child bearing period the urinary excretion of estrogen varies daily reaching peak excretion at the mid menstrual interval and again just before the onset of the menses. The total 24 hour urinary excretion varies between 15 and 30 microgram. Menopausal women excrete about the same amounts as do normal women between peaks of excretion. The daily 24 hour urine value for menopausal women will generally vary from 6 to 7 microgram although some excrete as much as 20 to 30 micrograms and others less than 5. The daily urinary excretion in adult males is 20 to 25 microgram while children of both sexes excrete but small amounts rarely in excess of 6 microgram.

80 grams sodium hydroxide diluted to 1000 ml
- 6 Ethyl alcohol 95%
- 7 Sulfuric acid 60-70%

Procedure

Collect a 24 hour sample of urine

Take a 20 ml aliquot

Add 2 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid

Boil on hot plate for 7 to 10 minutes and cool in ice bath

Transfer to a small separatory funnel and saturate with sodium chloride

Shake three times with 20, 15 and 10 ml portions of benzene (If an interface gel should form combine it with the benzene fraction)

The combined benzene extracts are washed

Once with a 15 ml portion of distilled water

Twice " " " " sodium carbonate

Once " " " " distilled water

To extract estrogens shake benzene fraction with 4 lots of 2N sodium hydroxide using 20, 15, 10 and 10 ml respectively

Combine sodium hydroxide extracts and acidify by adding 15 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid

Extract three times with benzene using one 20 ml portion and two 15 ml portions

Combine the benzene fraction and wash with

One 15 ml portion of distilled water

" " sodium carbonate

" " distilled water

When the benzene fraction has been freed of water evaporate it to dryness and dissolve the dry residue in 10 ml 95% ethyl alcohol

Recovery experiments of 0.2 and 11.5 microgram of estrone as well as a reagent blank of water are run simultaneously

Recovery of estrogen ranges between 50 and 60%

Fluorimetric Assay

Unknown	Standard	Blank
0.7 ml alcoholic extract	0.2 micrograms estrone	0.7 ml 95% alcohol
5.0 ml sulfuric acid (60-70%)	5.0 ml sulfuric acid (60-70%)	5.0 ml sulfuric acid (60-70%)

Stir thoroughly and place in boiling water bath for five minutes

Cool and read in Coleman photofluorometer Model #12 using a filter combination of B<sub>2</sub> and PC9A

Change to a filter combination of B<sub>2</sub> and PC9A and make a second set of readings

Calculation

$$\frac{\text{Reading of Unknown B}_2\text{B}}{\text{Reading of Standard B-B}} \times (\text{Conc. of standard} \times \frac{1}{0.7} \times \frac{24 \text{ hour volume}}{\text{aliquot used}}) = \text{Microgram of estrogens per 24 hour}$$

Procedure

- Collect a 24 hour urine sample using 7 ml of toluene as a preservative
- Make up to 200 ml and remove two aliquots of 100 ml each
- Place in a 1000 ml flask
- Add 100 ml toluene and bring to a boil under a reflux condenser
- To the boiling mixture add 50 ml concentrated hydrochloric acid and continue boiling for exactly 10 minutes
- Cool flask rapidly and transfer contents to a separatory funnel
- Shake. Let stand and draw off the urine
- Filter the toluene layer and the emulsion formed with gentle action through Whatman #1 filter paper on a Buchner funnel
- Extract twice again with 100 ml toluene filtering each time
- Combine toluene fractions and transfer to a clean separatory funnel

Wash

- Twice with 100 ml portions of normal sodium hydroxide
- “ “ distilled water
- Transfer toluene to a round bottom flask and evaporate nearly to dryness on a hot plate
- Place in a water bath and take to complete dryness under vacuum
- Transfer dry residue quantitatively with warm ethanol to a 20 ml conical centrifuge tube, and evaporate to dryness in a water bath under a stream of air
- To dry residue add exactly 4.0 ml ethanol and place in a beaker of water at 75°
- Completely dissolve residue by stirring with a glass rod and add drop-wise from a burette 16.0 ml of 0.1N sodium hydroxide (The addition of the sodium hydroxide should take about 3 minutes)
- Allow the tube to remain at 75° C temperature for an additional minute and then transfer beaker and tube to incubator at 37° C
- Let stand overnight
- Add approximately 8 to 10 mg Hyflo-Super Cel and mix with a stirring rod
- Wash rod with ethanol water mixture and centrifuge for 1 hour at 1500 r p m
- Remove supernatant fluid by suction
- Repeat precipitation 2 times more using water instead of sodium hydroxide and incubating for 2 hours instead of 24
- To final precipitate add 0.5 ml of ethanol and dissolve by stirring and warming to 70° C
- Add 1 to 2 mg Norite and continue warming for 2 minutes
- Filter into a test tube through a small Whatman #1 filter paper washing tube and filter 3 times with 2 ml portions of warm ethanol
- Evaporate filtrate and washings in a water bath under a stream of air and take to complete dryness in a vacuum desiccator over calcium chloride

Colorimetric Assay

- To dry pregnanediol add 10.0 ml sulfuric acid (concentrated)
- Place in water bath at 25° C for 20 minutes shaking occasionally
- Measure intensity of yellow color produced in a photoelectric colorimeter using a filter with an absorption maximum of 420 mμ
- Refer to a calibration curve made with known amounts of pure pregnane-3(α) 20 α-diol varying from 0.1 to 0.5 mg
- Make a fresh calibration curve each time
- (If on inspection of the dry residue of the unknown sample there should appear to be more than 5.0 mg dissolve it in a measured volume of ethanol and use an aliquot for the colorimetric assay)

Extract 3 times with 25 ml portions of 0.01 N sodium hydroxide and once with a 10 ml portion of distilled water
 Pool extract, acidify with concentrated hydrochloric acid and extract three times with half the volume of ether
 Evaporate ether to dryness and dissolve residue in measured volume of ethyl alcohol

Estradiol-Estrone fraction

Wash concentrated benzene extract
 Once with one-fourth its volume of dilute sulfuric acid
 Twice with 15 ml distilled water
 Extract 4 times with an equal volume of 1 N sodium hydroxide
 Acidify the sodium hydroxide extracts to a pH of less than 5 with concentrated hydrochloric acid and extract 3 times with 50 ml portions of ether
 Combine ether extracts and concentrate to 50 ml
 Wash the ether
 Once with 10 ml portion dilute sulfuric acid
 Twice " 20 " " sodium carbonate
 " " " " distilled water
 Evaporate ether to dryness and dissolve residue in measured volume of ethyl alcohol

Fluorimetric Assay

Place aliquots of alcoholic extracts in Pyrex test tubes having ground glass stoppers
 Evaporate to dryness in an electric oven at 120° C
 Cool. Add 7 ml phosphoric acid
 Stopper and heat in boiling water bath in the dark for 30 minutes
 Cool and measure fluorescence in the Coleman fluorometer using filters B<sub>1</sub> and PC<sub>1</sub>
 To measure fluorescence of blanks read with filters B<sub>1</sub> and PC

Calculation

$$\frac{B_1, B_1 \text{ of unknown}}{B_1, B_1 \text{ of standard}} \times \text{Conc of standard} \times \frac{24 \text{ hour vol}}{\text{aliquot used}} = \text{Micrograms of estrogen per 24 hours}$$

Urinary Pregnanediol<sup>26</sup>

Reagents

- 1 Toluene, sulfur free
Distil twice in an all glass still
- 2 Hydrochloric acid, concentrated
- 3 Sodium hydroxide, 1 normal
Dissolve 40 grams sodium hydroxide in 1000 ml distilled water
- 4 Ethyl alcohol
Reflux over sodium hydroxide and distil twice in an all glass still

- 6 Alcohol-water mixture
Mix 1 volume of alcohol with 4 volumes of distilled water
- 7 Norite
- 8 Sulfuric acid, concentrated

The Insulin Tolerance Test (Hypoglycemia Responsiveness)<sup>20</sup>

The test is performed after a 12 hour fast and either capillary or venous blood for sugar determinations may be used. The standard test consists of the intravenous injection of 0.1 unit per kilogram of body weight of regular insulin. Where severe hypopituitarism or Addison's disease is suspected the insulin dosage should be reduced to one-third the standard dose (0.033 units per kg. of body weight). If the latter fails to produce a fall in the blood sugar to approximately 45 per cent of the fasting level the test should be repeated with the standard insulin dosage. A control sample of blood is obtained and again 20 30 45 60 90 and 120 minutes after the insulin injection for blood sugar determination. The insulin tolerance test is inapplicable when the fasting blood sugar level is above the normal range. The test is also not indicated when the fasting blood sugar is below the normal range and within hypoglycemic levels since this in itself would indicate hypoglycemia unresponsive.

The maximum fall in the blood sugar level occurs within the first 20 to 30 minutes in normal individuals and in patients with Addison's disease hypopituitarism and anorexia nervosa. In primary myxedema the reduction is definitely lower and the blood sugar reaches the lowest level in approximately 45 minutes. The return of the blood sugar to control levels occurs within 2 hours in normal individuals and in most patients with anorexia nervosa. In hypopituitarism Addison's disease and in some patients with anorexia nervosa, the hypoglycemia unresponsiveness is characterized by an abnormally slow return of the blood sugar to the control level. In primary myxedema there is a similar delay but this is perhaps the result of the late development of the hypoglycemia rather than an evidence of a delayed response to the hypoglycemia.

The fall in the blood sugar level following the injection of insulin is usually associated with some clinical hypoglycemic manifestations such as a sense of anxiety hunger, dizziness tachycardia and sweating. Clouding of consciousness evidenced by confusion in understanding or answering questions and coma call for prompt interruption of the test by the administration of adrenalin intramuscularly or glucose intravenously or the oral use of sweetened drinks.

Glucose Insulin Tolerance Test<sup>21</sup>

In this test the amount of glucose given is that given in the glucose tolerance test. The amount of insulin is that given in the insulin tolerance test.

Both the glucose and insulin are administered simultaneously and blood samples are collected at 0 20 30 45 60 90 and 120 minutes.

In the Engel and Scott procedure 0.1 unit/kg. body weight of regular insulin is given intravenously to the fasting subject. Thirty minutes later or earlier if hypoglycemia supervenes 0.8 gm. of glucose per kilogram of body weight is given by mouth. Blood samples are taken at 0 30 60 90 120 and 150 minutes.

Hexosamine in Serum<sup>22</sup>*Reagents

1. Physiologic saline
9.0 grams sodium chloride dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 1000 ml
2. Hydrochloric acid 2 normal
164 ml. concentrated hydrochloric acid diluted to 1000 ml. with distilled water
3. Sodium hydroxide 0.5 normal
20 grams sodium hydroxide dissolved in distilled water and diluted to 1000 ml
4. Acetyl acetone reagent
Redistill acetyl acetone in an all glass still Dissolve 1 ml. acetyl acetone in 50 ml. 0.5 normal sodium carbonate
Stored in the refrigerator this solution will be stable for 3 to 4 days

Oral Glucose Tolerance Test<sup>36</sup>

Determine the patient's weight

Prepare a weighed amount of glucose equivalent to 1.75 grams of glucose for every kilogram of the patient's weight

Dissolve the glucose in the ratio of 4 grams per 10 ml of water, adding the juice of 1 lemon for flavor

The patient is fasted from 7 P.M. of the night before the test until the test is completed

Obtain a fasting blood sugar and a specimen of urine at the same time

Exactly  $\frac{1}{2}$  hour after the sugar drink has been taken, another blood sugar and specimen of urine are collected

Repeat this procedure at the end of 1, 2 and 3 hours

In a normal result the highest level is not more than 30 to 60 mg. above the fasting level and the fasting level is reached in 2 hours. There is no glycosuria. Normal fasting levels vary between 80 and 120 mg. %. In diabetes the level attained is higher and there is a failure to return to the normal level by the end of the second to third hour. There may be glycosuria. In renal glycosuria, the curve is normal but sugar appears in the urine. Increased sugar tolerance (a flat curve or only a slight rise, less than 30 mg.) occurs in hypophyseal dysfunction. Addison's disease, hypothyroidism and muscular dystrophy. Disease of the small intestine may result in a flat curve because of poor absorption (ileitis sprue).

Intravenous Glucose Tolerance Test<sup>37</sup>

The test is performed on a fasting subject and a control sample of blood is obtained for sugar analysis

50 ml. of a 50% solution of glucose in distilled water is injected over a 2 minute period

Samples of blood are obtained at half hourly intervals for a period of 2 hours

If the blood sugar level at the end of 2 hours exceeds 120 mg. % the patient probably has diabetes while a blood sugar value of less than 100 mg. % excludes diabetes

Results between 100 and 120 mg. % are difficult to evaluate

Exton-Rose Glucose Tolerance Test<sup>38</sup>

This glucose tolerance test is carried out after the patient has fasted overnight. However, he should have taken at least 100 grams of carbohydrate daily for 3 days prior to the test

Technic

1. Dissolve 100 grams of glucose in 600 ml. of water flavored with lemon juice
2. Collect a control blood and urine for sugar determination
3. Have patient drink one-half the total dose of glucose water within a minute
4. 30 minutes after the ingestion of this portion collect blood and urine
5. Directly after collection of blood give the remaining portion of glucose water
6. 30 minutes after ingestion of second dose collect blood and urine

Results

In normal patients a rise not exceeding 75 mg. of sugar over the control level is present in the 30 minute specimen. The blood sugar level of the hour sample should not exceed the 30 minute specimen by more than 5 mg. Normally the blood sugar at the end of 1 hour is less than that at the end of 30 minutes. All urine specimens should be free of sugar as tested with Benedict's qualitative reagent

In diabetes, there is a rise of not less than 10 mg. per cent of the blood sugar in the 60 minute sample following the second dose of glucose, and the blood sugar value usually exceeds 160 mg. per cent

Calculation

$$\frac{\text{Reading of unknown}}{\text{Reading of standard}} \times \text{mg. of standard} \times \frac{100}{0.02} = \text{mg. glucosamine/100 ml serum}$$

Normal values: 90 to 120 mg./100 ml

The Male Frog Test for Early Pregnancy<sup>41</sup>

Male frogs, Rana pipiens, are used for the test. The first morning sample of urine is collected and 5 ml. injected subcutaneously into the dorsal or lateral lymph sacs of the frog. Each frog is placed in a separate clean dry glass jar with a perforated lid and is set aside at room temperature for 2 to 4 hours. At the end of this time any urine excreted is examined microscopically for spermatozoa. If none are present the urine is drained from the jar care being taken to leave the frog undisturbed. The frog is then seized in the hand while still in the jar. This pressure usually induces another urination and this specimen is then examined for spermatozoa.

When spermatozoa are present the test is positive.

The test animals may be used for another test after 4 or 5 days.

Aschheim Zondek Test for Pregnancy<sup>42</sup>

Immature mice 3 to 4 weeks old weighing 6 to 9 grams are used for the assay. The first morning specimen of urine is collected and from 1.2 to 2.4 ml. are injected subcutaneously in 8 equal injections over a period of 48 hours. Ninety-six hours after the first injection the mice are sacrificed and the ovaries examined for corpora hemorrhagica.

The test is considered positive if there is a single hemorrhagic follicle or corpus luteum.

Friedman Test for Pregnancy<sup>43</sup>

Two adult female rabbits weighing not less than 500 grams are used. They are kept isolated from the male for at least 4 weeks prior to the test. The first morning sample of urine is collected and on each of two successive days 10 ml. are injected into the marginal vein of the ear. Forty-eight hours after the first injection the rabbits are killed or simply anesthetized and the ovaries examined.

The presence of enlarged hemorrhagic follicles constitutes a positive test.

The rabbits may be used several times, provided an interval of 1 month is allowed between tests.

Examination of Vaginal Smears<sup>44</sup>

Aspirate vaginal secretion by means of a glass pipette to which is attached a rubber bulb of 1-ounce capacity. Expel secretion onto a clean dry glass slide which is placed immediately in a solution of equal parts of ether and 95 per cent alcohol for fixation. After two minutes (or longer if desired) remove the slide and place in Shorr. Single Differential Stain for two minutes. Consecutively dip the slide 10 times in 80 per cent alcohol, in 95 per cent alcohol, in absolute alcohol and finally in xylol. For a permanent preparation the slide is then mounted in damar.

Examine thinner portions of the smear under low or high power objective. Cornified epithelial cells (indicative of a maximum estrogenic effect) are colored a brilliant orange-red. Non cornified cells appear in various shades and intensity of bluish-green.

There is considerable fluctuation in the cytologic composition in normal women. Variations occur in different individuals and in different stages of the menstrual cycle of the same person. Hence it is usually necessary to study a series of slides

- 5 Ethyl alcohol 95%
Redistil in an all glass still
- 6 Ehrlich's reagent
Dissolve 800 mg p-dimethylaminobenzaldehyde in 30 ml of 95% ethyl alcohol and add 30 ml of concentrated hydrochloric acid. Stored in the refrigerator this solution will be stable for 10 days.
To purify p-dimethylaminobenzaldehyde
Dissolve 125 grams of the aldehyde in 700 ml of dilute hydrochloric acid (1 part concentrated HCl sp gr 1.19 to 6 parts distilled water)
Place in beaker and dilute with half the volume of distilled water
Add dilute sodium hydroxide (15 to 20%) slowly with mechanical stirring Filter off the first precipitate and discard. This will be slightly colored.
Precipitate the rest of the aldehyde by the further addition of sodium hydroxide
Filter and dry
Collect only the white precipitate
- 7 Stock standard
Dissolve 100 mg glucosamine hydrochloride in distilled water and dilute to 100 ml
Store in refrigerator and prepare fresh every 3 weeks
Dilute daily for working standards

Procedure

Dilute 1 ml serum to 10 ml with physiologic saline
Transfer 2 ml diluted serum to a 10 ml volumetric flask
Add 2 ml 2 normal hydrochloric acid
Stopper and place in boiling water bath for 5 hours
Remove from boiling water and cool under tap water
Dilute to 10 ml mark and filter through a Whatman #5 filter paper

Titration for neutralization

A 10 ml aliquot of the filtrate is titrated carefully with 0.5 normal sodium hydroxide to determine the amount necessary to neutralize the sample. For the colorimetric assay this quantity of sodium hydroxide is added to each filtrate.

Colorimetric Assay

Into a 10 ml volumetric flask place
10 ml filtrate
0.5 normal sodium hydroxide (quantity determined as above)
10 ml acetyl acetone reagent
Mix stopper and place in boiling water bath for 25 minutes
Remove and cool in water bath for 2 minutes

Add

30 ml 95% ethyl alcohol
10 ml Ehrlich's reagent
Shake gently and place in hot water for 3 minutes
Remove and place in cold water for 3 minutes
Dilute to 10 ml with alcohol stopper and mix well
Let stand for 30 minutes and read in photoelectric colorimeter using a green filter with a maximal absorption at 525 mμ Standard solutions containing 0.02, 0.04, and 0.06 mg of glucosamine as well as a blank of all reagents are run simultaneously.

in order to evaluate ovarian function. However, estrogen deficiency is readily recognized in a single smear by the total or relative absence of cornified cells and by the presence of blue stained small round or oval (deep) cell with large nuclei.

Semen Analyses<sup>45</sup>

After 3 days of sexual abstinence, semen (obtained by coitus interruptus or masturbation) is ejaculated in its entirety directly into a clean dry wide-mouthed glass container.

Keep at room temperature and examine within 2 hours.

Volume of ejaculate should be noted (normal average 3 ml.)

Sperm count is performed after shaking the specimen thoroughly. The semen is drawn up into a white blood cell pipette to the 0 mark. (When the sperm count is low, semen is drawn up to the number 1 mark.) The remainder of the pipette is filled to the number 11 mark with a diluent consisting of 1 per cent phenol in a saturated solution of sodium bicarbonate. The same technique is employed as in ordinary blood counts. The total number of sperm contained in five blocks of 16 squares of a hemacytometer counting chamber is obtained. The addition of 6 ciphers to this figure gives the number of sperm per cubic centimeter. (The result is divided by 2 if the semen is drawn up to the number 1 mark.)

When the number of sperm is very low the count is performed without dilution of the semen. Add one or two drops of dilute hydrochloric acid to the ejaculate. After shaking, aspirate the semen directly into the pipette. Flood the counting chamber and obtain the number of sperm in the red blood cell field. The addition of 4 ciphers to the number found in the entire field gives the sperm count per cubic centimeter.

Normal average count 120 000 000 per cubic centimeter

Motility is judged by simple observation of a high power field. There is normally little decline in motility for the first 3 to 5 hours. At the end of 24 hours a few sperm are still motile in normal ejaculates.

Normal average 50-75 per cent motile at 2 hours

30-40	'	6

Abnormal morphology is studied in the dried and stained smear of the semen. The technique is similar to that employed for a differential blood count. Shake the specimen and place a drop on a slide. With a second slide draw the fluid as a thin layer over the length of the first slide. Dry smear in air and fix in moderate heat. Stain by the Gram method and examine with the oil immersion objective.

The normal sperm head has a uniformly oval contour. Any deviation in size or shape of the head constitutes a morphological abnormality. Abnormal forms are classified as tapering, round, duplicate, giant, pinhead and amorphous cells. Count 100 sperm cells and determine the proportion of abnormal head.

Normal average of abnormal forms not in excess of 2 per cent.
